PUGET SOUND AND LAKES WASHINGTON AND UNION CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers. The attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] is called to the communication, which is in response to a resolution submitted by him a few days ago. The communication from the Chief of Engineers will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, January 23, 1903.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a resolution of the Senate of the United States, dated January 21, 1903, directing the Secretary of War to transmit to the Senate the report of the Board of Engineers constituted to determine the feasibility of constructing a canal connecting Puget Sound with Lakes Washington and Union.

The river and harbor act of June 13, 1902, required the appointment of a Board of Engineers to consider the aforesaid subject, and directs that the report of such board shall be submitted to Congress at the present session.

The report of the board was received in this office a few days ago, and it is the intention to send it to Congress, as required by the law, just as soon as it can be properly examined and prepared for printing. The report is voluminous and it is essential that it be given careful consideration before submission to Congress. It is probable that it can be submitted to the Secretary of War within a few days.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. L. GILLESPIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army.

Mr. TURNER. I move that the communication and accompanying letter from the Chief of Engineers lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I present a petition and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana presents a petition, which he asks may be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the petition.

The Secretary read as follows:

BRISTOW, IND. T., January 3, 1903.

To Senator BEVERIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: At a meeting of the citizens and commercial club of the town of Bristow the following resolutions were adopted and ordered forwarded to your address in Washington.

Yours, very respectfully,

H. F. JOHNSON.

BRISTOW COMMERCIAL CLUB ROOMS.

Whereas there is now pending in the United States Senate many bills for the relief of the present intolerable conditions now existing in the Indian Territory, looking to the relief of 500,000 loyal American citizens from the inadequacy and insufficient mode of our present form of government; looking to the establishment of a sufficient and very necessary public-school system, of which we are at present wholly without, leaving 100,000 American children to grow up in ignorance and crime, to the detriment of our republican institutions and the foundation of our Government; looking to the proper care and handling of the Indian question, the wards of our Government, to whom we owe a solemn duty to protect and educate, that they may ultimately be able to cope with intelligent and an able people, that they may become self-sustaining and able to care for their own heritage against the ravages, greed, and encroachment of designing persons; and last, but not least, looking to the creation out of a most fertile and productive land of a sovereign and indestructible State, whose people are now worthy of sisterhood in the Union of these grand commonwealths, and amid whose firmament her brightness would never be dimmed by disloyalty, and on whose escutcheon there will be permanently inscribed "Liberty, justice, equality;" and

Whereas the omnibus bill now pending in the Senate seeks by want of legislation to leave us in our now destitute condition, and provides nothing for our urgent needs and wants; and

Whereas the substitute known as the Nelson bill entirely covers the ground and gives us a voice in the framing of a government under which we and our posterity are to live, a right and privilege every American citizen demands and is entitled to under our Constitution and his birthright: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we are unqualifiedly and unconditionally opposed to the passage of the omnibus bill or any kindred legislation, but ask and demand that the Nelson bill or Beveridge substitute be passed and made a law, to the end that we may become one grand State, united with and on an equal footing with our sister Territory, Oklahoma.

Thus done, passed, and adopted by the Citizens' and Commercial Club of the town of Bristow this 3d day of January, 1903.

H. F. JOHNSON, Chairman.
J. W. OVERSTREET, Acting Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I have a very large number of other resolutions, not perhaps so well or succinctly put, but to the same purport as the resolution I have asked to have read and which has been read to the Senate. Of course I do not intend to address the Senate or to read them this morning, and perhaps I shall not read them at all; but I could not refrain at this juncture from asking the Senate to listen to this very remarkable resolution of these citizens, which rings with a note of uncommon sincerity, and puts before the Senate not only their desires as citizens, but the wants of their children in the way of preparation for future citizenship.

At some future time, Mr. President, I may introduce further resolutions showing what are the desires of those people and the very unusual and pressing reasons upon which they are based.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. The matter has passed from the consideration of the Senate, but I desire to call the attention of the Presiding Officer and of the Senate to the rule of the Senate which requires that all petitions shall be presented and referred without debate. The custom has grown up of discussing bills which are before the Senate at other times and in the morning hour to the exclusion of other business of the Senate, and I desire to give notice that hereafter I shall object to any discussion of that kind.

There is another clause of the rules, which undoubtedly has escaped the attention of Senators, that it is not permissible to read an entire petition, but that its contents must be succinctly stated.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, in response to the Senator's point of order, I desire to say that the petition was read by unanimous consent; and with reference to addressing the Senate upon the petition, in so far as I did so, it was done in pursuance of a practice the precedent for which has been set by venerable Senators within this body at the present session.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. QUAY. My point of order is that discussion is out of order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I distinctly stated that I did not intend to address the Senate.

He also submitted an amendment relating to the appointment of native citizens of Porto Rico to the United States Military Academy, intended to be proposed by him to the Military Academy appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $500 to pay William S. Torbert for the preparation of an index to the code of the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 copies of S. 6899, to incorporate the Spanish-American War Veterans' Association of the United States.

COURTS-MARTIAL IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. RAWLINS. I offer a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands, and what judgments rendered by them in consequence of the dispatch sent by the Secretary of War to Major-General Chaffee referred to in the memorandum of the Secretary of War for the Adjutant-General under date of April 15, 1902; also what action was taken by the President or the Secretary of War on the judgment of any court-martial so ordered, either approving or disapproving the same.

Also, that the records in full of the several following courts-martial ordered and held in the Philippine Islands be communicated, to wit:

That on Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith.
That on Maj. Edwin F. Glenn, Fifth Infantry.
That on Lieut. Edwin A. Hickman, First Cavalry.
That on Lieut. J. H. A. Day, Marine Corps.
That on Maj. L. W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps.
That on Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry.
That on Capt. James A. Ryan, Fifteenth Cavalry.
That on Lieut. —— Cooke.
That on Lieut. Julian E. Gaiyot.
That on Lieut. N. E. Cook, of the Philippine Scouts.
That on Lieut. W. S. Sinclair, battalion adjutant, Twenty-eight Infantry.

Also any record or reports of investigations which may be on file in the War Department relating to the case of the so-called "Father Augustine," alleged to have been put to death by Cornelius M. Brownell, formerly a captain of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, at Banate, island of Panay, province of Iloilo, in December, 1900, also any investigations made by the Department of Justice into the facts of such case, together with any legal conclusions reached thereon and reported to the War Department.

Mr. LODGE. That is a very long resolution, asking for many documents. I should like to examine it. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

ISLE OF PINES.

Mr. CARMACK. I offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the Government of the Republic of Cuba is exercising right of sovereignty and control over the Isle of Pines, and whether any, and if so, what, instructions have been given for the transfer of said island from the control of the authorities of the United States to those of the Republic of Cuba, and what steps, if any, have been taken to protect the interests of such citizens of the United States as have purchased property and settled in the Isle of Pines believing that it was subject to the sovereignty of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. CARMACK. I ask that the resolution I offered be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to see it in print first. I asked that it might go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was made, and the resolution went over under the rule.

Mr. CARMACK. In this connection, I present a petition of sundry residents and property owners of the Isle of Pines, relative to the sovereignty and control over that island of the Republic of Cuba. I move that the petition be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Relations with Cuba be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at an annual salary of $1,200, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

PANAMA CANAL AND PANAMA RAILROAD.

Mr. TURNER. As the morning business now seems to be concluded, I again ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 6973.

Mr. QUAY. I object for the present, until I can make a motion to take up the statehood bill. I will then yield. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the omnibus statehood bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to lay before the Senate—if the Senator from Pennsylvania will pardon the Chair for one moment—a resolution coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MORGAN, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, as a separate document, the papers included in appendices 1 and 2 to a statement of Col. O. H. Ernst, made to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals on June 14, 1900, setting forth certain concessions and laws of Colombia relating to the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad, which statement was reported to the Senate by said committee on December 12, 1901, on pages 244 to 270, inclusive, of Report No. 1, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.

2. Resolved, That the treaty between the United States and Colombia signed on the 22d of January, 1903, and sent to the Senate, be printed in bill form for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. While I do not believe that it is necessary to reprint the documents referred to or to publish the treaty in bill form, yet I see no particular objection to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 13630) to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 13791) to quitclaim all interest of the United States of America in and to square 1131 in the city of Washington, D. C., to Sidney Bieber;

A bill (H. R. 14899) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate The National Florence Crittenton Mission."

A bill (H. R. 15799) to confirm the name of Seward square for the space formed by the intersection of C street south and Pennsylvania and North Carolina avenues, District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. 16099) to cancel certain taxes assessed against the Kall tract.

The bill (H. R. 16970) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his question of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is that the motion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania can not be entertained except by unanimous consent at this time, and I interpose an objection and call the attention of the Chair to the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule VII?

Mr. ALDRICH. The second clause of Rule VII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator read Rule VII?

Mr. ALDRICH (reading):

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the Calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. QUAY. That is in the alternative. The first alternative has been arrived at already, because the morning business has been concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. The first one, but not the second.

Mr. QUAY. Either the morning business must be gone through with or else the hour of 1 o'clock must have arrived.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Chair has any question about it, I would be very glad to submit some remarks on the subject.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Chair rule on the point I make. On January 12 I gave notice that after the morning business on Tuesday, January 27, I would ask leave to submit some remarks on Senate joint resolution 133. I ask the Chair whether I am not entitled to the floor after the morning business is concluded?

Mr. ALDRICH. There is a point of order already pending, I suggest.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear what the Senator from Rhode Island has to say, because the inclination of the mind of the Chair is to overrule the point of order. The Chair believes that "or" is in the alternative, as the Senator from Pennsylvania suggests.

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator will yield one moment I will relieve the situation. The Senator from West Virginia has given notice that on the conclusion of the morning business to-day he will proceed to discuss the joint resolution in relation to a commission to investigate the pension laws. I withdraw my motion for the purpose of enabling the Senator from West Virginia to proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall not object to the withdrawal, although on some subsequent occasion I shall be very glad to submit some remarks upon this question, which I think is an important one in relation to the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, and the Chair would be very happy to hear what the Senator has to say in relation to the point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. However, I shall not undertake to do it now, but will allow the Senator from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws his motion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from West Virginia is ready to proceed.

Mr. QUAY. I withdrew it in order that the Senator from West Virginia might proceed with his remarks.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Pennsylvania had given notice?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

BRIDGE AT NOME, ALASKA.

Mr. TURNER. I ask the Senator from West Virginia to allow me to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the Nome bridge bill, which was reported this morning and has been already read. It will take but a moment.

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the Senator from Washington if the bill will not provoke discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] from the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 6973) authorizing the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, title 3, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provisions for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," to construct a free bridge across the Snake River at Nome city, in the Territory of Alaska, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, section 1, line 6, after the words "during the," to strike out "opening" and insert "season;" in line 8, after the word "and," to strike out "that;" in line 10, after the word "telegraph," to insert "and other;" and in the same line, after the word "purposes," to insert "and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies;" so as to make the section read:

That the city of Nome, a municipal corporation organized and existing under chapter 21, title 3, of an act of Congress approved June 6, 1900, entitled "An act making further provisions for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," is hereby authorized and empowered to construct, operate, and maintain a free bridge across the Snake River, to be located at such point within the corporate limits of the city of Nome, in said Territory of Alaska, as shall be approved by the Secretary of War: Provided, That such bridge shall be constructed as a drawbridge, and the draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats. And whatever kind of bridge is constructed, the city of Nome shall maintain thereon at its own expense from sunset to sunrise, during the season of navigation, such lights or other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and approaches for postal telegraph and other purposes, and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and said bridge shall be so constructed and operated as not to interfere with the navigation of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, section 2, line 5, after the word "construction," to insert "or after completion;" so as to read:

And should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction or after completion, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and any changes in said bridge which the Secretary of War may at any time deem necessary and order in the interests of navigation shall be made by the city of Nome at its own expense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the act (S. 6216) to pay in part judgments rendered under an act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Hawaii for property destroyed in suppressing the bubonic plague in said Territory in 1899 and 1900, and authorizing the Territory of Hawaii to issue bonds for the payment of the remaining claims.

COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE PENSION LAWS.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask to have read at the desk the joint resolution (S. R. 133) creating a commission to investigate the present pension laws, which I introduced on the 3d day of December last, upon which I desire to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That a commission consisting of three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and two members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is hereby created to examine into the present pension laws and report any changes that may be desirable therein; and, further, to investigate the desirability of pensioning all soldiers who served ninety days during the war of the rebellion, were honorably discharged, make application, and have reached the age of 62 years, at the rate of $12 per month.

Said commission is authorized to employ a clerk and stenographer and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary, said stenographer and clerks to be paid such compensation as the said commission may deem just and reasonable.

Said commission shall, on or before February 1, 1904, make report to Congress, which report shall embrace the conclusions reached by said commission on the subjects and laws examined, and any recommendations said commission may see proper to make, by bill or otherwise, respecting said laws.

Any vacancy occurring in the membership of said commission, by resignation or otherwise, shall be filled by the presiding officer of the Senate or House, respectively, according as the vacancy occurs in the Senate or House representation on said commission.

The sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the necessary expenses of said commission, such payments to be made on the certificate of the chairman of said commission.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, in rising to speak to the resolution which I offered on December 3, 1902, and which has just been read, I realize that, at first blush, the feeling of partisanship, or, perchance, sectionalism, may be aroused from its slumber. I trust, however, that the real motive and true sentiment of the resolution will find its lodgment, for it is one of patriotism and not sectionalism.

The strength and stability of the Republic depend upon the zeal and patriotism of its citizen soldiers. This was the source of defense relied upon by the founders of our Government after the experience of the Revolution. With marvelous judgment the fathers saw that the defense of the Republic must be vested in all of its citizens, and not in a standing army. To this end a law was enacted making every able-bodied male between the ages of 18 and 45 liable to service in the militia of the several States.

It was the intention of the founders to intrust the defense of the nation to a body of well-trained citizen soldiers, who would spring to arms at the first approach of danger. The plan was one of mutual self-defense.

Instead of a standing army which should be maintained at a heavy expense to the people, the founders wisely decided to reward the soldiers who risked their lives, their health, and their future prospects in the defense of the Republic by appropriate pensions and certain emoluments. They adopted the plan of community of interests. The people were expected to pay the soldiers while in active service, and to maintain them when incapacitated by military service and unable to earn a livelihood. This plan is manifested by a series of laws extending from the early days of the Republic to the present time.

Mr. President, I realize again that in this rapid-transit age, in this era of commercialism, when the wheels of industry sparkle with their rapid revolution, it is hard for those charged with the ship's destiny to steer from breakers, lashed by so strong a current, and anchor for a moment on the crest of patriotism. It is well to listen to the still, small voice that says to us, "It is not all of life to live," if, in living, the nobler and sweeter sentiments are to be blasted by the cold winds of greed, or the flowers to fade by the winter's wind of avarice.

I beg to assure you, Mr. President, that I am moved by memories that are sacred to me, memories of bygone days, memories born amid scenes of carnage and strife, and, standing here beneath the shadow of this noble structure, every stone of which represents a human sacrifice, whose lofty dome as it rises to meet the sun in its coming speaks for those whose voices are hushed in the silent chambers of the dead, to ask this people, whose country, whose Constitution, and whose flag live by their heroism and their blood, to hear the feeble voice of a comrade speaking for those who can not be heard. Allow me to lay the hand of patriotism upon the busy wheels—hush the mad thirst of commercialism, and bid them be still, while "our brothers' blood cries out from the ground," not for vengeance, but for justice.

Deafen our ears as we may, blind our eyes as we will, and steal from our hearts their brightest jewels, the cold, stern fact stares us in the face. Demur if you will, plead as you can, and answer as you may, there is no escaping the judgment, that all we have or may have, or may hope to have, of national wealth, glory, and renown was demised to us by the will of the heroes of the civil war, a testament written in their life's blood and attested by a heroism without a parallel in all history. It is for the survivors of that gigantic struggle; it is for the godfathers of this uncrowned king, who baptized it in blood that it might be saved, that I ask that you pause, turn a moment from the busy scenes that crowd upon you, and "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." I want to adorn the ushering in of the new year with the adoption of a sentiment, justified by precedent and founded upon the highest principles of human justice and right.

I want to see my country, the "land of the free and the home of the brave," whose flag is ever unfurled to shelter the oppressed; whose great hand reached forth and touched the harp that sent the songs of liberty playing upon the waves of the Caribbean Sea; that gathered the broken fragments of the Antilles and reset them in the coronet of nations; unfurled the lone-star banner of a newborn republic, and erected the temple of human liberty upon the ruins of monarchical tyranny, whose stars now shelter the bleaching bones of her heroes from the tropical skies, be just and liberal to those who gave this arm its strength, and but for whom this giant, if at all, would be dismembered and disemboweled.

How can we, Mr. President, the beneficiaries of this glorious heritage, longer justify or excuse our seeming, if not real, ingratitude? This measure, following the precedent incident to the Mexican war, is intended to remove favoritism and to do equal justice to all alike. We turn to-day and read the aggregate of the pension roll, and rejoice that so much has been given and so many have been provided for. Divine teaching bids us "rejoice with those who do rejoice and weep with those who weep." Mr. President, I feel moved to add my tears to their tears, rather than my rejoicing to their rejoicing, for I can never rejoice so long as I feel that there is one who offered his sacrifice left wandering, uncared for, homeless, and unsheltered.

Large, Mr. President, as the roll now appears, mammoth as seems the aggregate of a nation's bounty, it is an aggregate summed from all its wars. Yet however large that roll be, it is not so large as the muster roll, and no man was summoned who was not needed, and needed at the most momentous hour, and having answered to the call that tried the souls of men, and to which call none but the true and the brave responded, they should not now be forgotten. Go, Mr. President, read the muster roll from '61 to '65, subtract from it those that sleep in the cemeteries, and then compare the remainder with the pension roll, and tell me where that vast army is.

Who cares for them? There is not one of them, perhaps, but was as brave and true a patriot as his comrades, who are now provided for. Their names have never been enrolled upon the pension list; they have been knocking, but knocking in vain. Their names are not written upon the pension roll, but they are written by their heroism upon many a battlefield. By what process of reasoning, upon what principle of justice, by what teaching of humanity shall one-half be clothed and the other naked, one-half be fed and the other hungry? They were as brave as their comrades, their sacrifices were as great, their devotion as true, and their patriotism as loyal.

It is true they returned to home and loved ones with no battle scar to testify and no hospital certificate to bear evidence, but with an honorable discharge as a heritage. Yes, let this heritage be transmitted to posterity as an heirloom, and while a beautiful inheritance to those who are to live afterwards, it will not drive the winter's wind from the cabin of the aged sire. Mr. President, it is for those whose voices have not been heard that this resolution is intended, to remind the nation of its debt of gratitude to them, and to blaze the way for every veteran that he may find shelter in the home he saved, and that he shall no longer ask for bread and receive a stone.

We, Mr. President, love to boast of the greatness of our country. We write its praises and sing its glories, unmindful of the hands, now withered with age, once crimsoned with blood; of shoulders, now stooped, that once carried the knapsack and the musket; of the head, now bowed beneath the burden of years, that once marched erect to the cannon's mouth. Shall we, revelling in the heritage earned by their valor, withhold from them the crumbs that fall from the nation's table? Shall we demand a pierced hand or a wounded side as evidence, or will we accept the enlistment and honorable discharge as the basis of a verdict of "well done, good and faithful servants?" Are we to sit patiently by and wait until the veteran becomes a pauper before answering his cry or until he begs for bread before we appease his hunger? What a commentary this would be upon our boasted greatness, what a cloud upon the sky of our glory!

Mr. President, are we who rejoice to hear our national anthem resounding throughout a continent, to see one flag, the pride and glory of one people, every stripe of which is a herald of humanity and every star an evangelist of civil and religious liberty, sheltering one country which, to paraphrase the beautiful words of another, "stretches from the easternmost cliff on the Atlantic that blushes in the kindling dawn to the last promontory on the Pacific which catches the parting kiss of the setting sun"—are we then, the beneficiaries of this greatness, to require a pauper's oath or surgeon's certificate before we in some measure make even small acknowledgment of our gratitude by substantial recognition of the sacrifices made in our behalf?

To whom, Mr. President, do we owe all this? Future generations should learn from us where to turn with grateful reverence, and to what shrine to make their pilgrimage. Then why defer it? Why postpone it? Why leave it to others further removed from the scene of action? Why say to the shivering veteran, Wait! He has already waited too long. Yes; the hour has arrived, the duty is ours, the responsibility rests with us, and we should meet it with that rectitude of purpose that has ever characterized our great and glorious people, and marching bravely forward register upon the records of our country a determination that will meet with the approval of every patriot of every section, of every party, and of every creed.

Let us this day declare that not only the blind and the halt, the maimed and the starving, but every soldier who stood under the flag, left his home and his loved ones, and offered himself a sacrifice upon the altar of his country, shall receive from the land he saved a generous recognition of gratitude. Mr. President, if there were no precedent for this resolution, it would be our duty to make a precedent, but it has been made for us, and it is ours to follow. Weigh, Mr. President, the wars of 1845 and 1865—one was for greed and the other for glory, one was to add to our domain the other to save that which was born of the inspired genius of our fathers. The one added a new star, the other saved the galaxy; the one sprinkled the blood upon the outer post, the other crimsoned every field with the world's best and noblest blood from Fort Sumter to Appomattox.

Yet, Mr. President, after forty years, though our nation was still bleeding from the shock of battle, only convalescent from that dreadful catastrophe, a weakling compared with the giant of to-day, we removed all conditions, threw wide open the doors of our Pension Bureau, and gave alike to every soldier of the Mexican war who had reached the age of 62, or to the widow of a soldier. No search light of the physician's skill, no X-rays of judicial investigation, no hospital record, no pauper's certificate, only the enlistment, his honorable discharge, and his age constituted the passport that led him to his country's bounty.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am listening with great interest to what the Senator is saying, and I wish to ask him at this point if the Mexican pension law was not passed about 1886?

Mr. SCOTT. It was passed in 1887. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. President, have we grown colder now than then? Has our patriotism been chilled by our growth and our sense of duty overshadowed by our greed and avarice? I may be answered that the roll is greater now than then, and the burden would fall heavier upon the shoulders of the people. I reply that the nation is greater, its shoulders are broader, and its frame more gigantic. Yes, the proportion is vastly greater in favor of the strength and ability of the nation than is the veteran roll call of the survivors of the Mexican war, as compared with the war of '61 and '65.

Mr. President, when that resolution was passed in 1887 we were an isolated people, ranking scarcely fifth among the commercial nations of the world. To-day, by the blessings of a kind Providence and the energy of a brave people, we have passed full mast from the lonely sea of isolation into the great ocean of nations, and we must take our place in bearing the responsibilities and discharging the obligations of the leading nations of the world. We rejoice to-day when the roll call is sounded to hear this, the uncrowned king of the world, answering first to the call.

Yes; from our garners of agriculture we are feeding the world. We behold with pride American machinery spanning the waters of the Nile, and hear the echo of the whistle of the American engine amid the Egyptian pyramids. We read the records and strike the balance of trade and find more than $600,000,000 to the credit of the American merchant, while the seas of the world are being whitened with the sails of American commerce. Yes; she is destined to conquer the world, not through carnage nor by the sword, but by the great principles of true Americanism. She is destined to conquer the world's trade and place the crown of American prosperity upon the throne of conquered empires.

Then, Mr. President, let her commercial growth fan and not smother the fires of her patriotism. These are the two great essential pillars upon which this mighty structure must rest. Is there one here who is not proud alike when he watches the march of his country's prosperity into the fields of older countries and when he beholds his flag waving in triumph over the imperial ruins of Spain, whose folds were unfurled in liberty's name and bathed in the blood that heroes gave it? Mr. President, we can not, if we would, deny our ability to fulfill the requirements of this resolution. Are you willing to confess your refusal to do justice to our veterans?

Mr. President, were we unable, I should say to my comrade, wait, and from his withered lips you would hear no murmur; but the table is laden with the fruits of his toil, while over yonder he sits weary and lonely by the roadside, his threadbare coat wrapped about him, his palsied arm hanging heavily by his side, his tired limbs trembling with years and cares, and waking from his reverie hears the command "Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; thou shalt plant the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil." Do I hear it whispered that we are not able to feed the hungry and clothe the naked? Do you tell me the pension roll has grown too large? I answer, Mr. President, that it is not larger than the muster roll—one is and must be measured by the other. I would not add one name to the one, and God forbid that I should obliterate one from the other. By the sacrifices of the one we must measure our liability to the other. We have received more than we can ever give.

At the famous Hampton Roads conference, called with the hope of ringing down the curtain upon that tragic stage, when the representatives of the Union and the Confederacy met, Mr. Lincoln, it is reported (though since denied), pointing to a sheet of paper he held in his hand, addressing Mr. Stephens of the Confederacy, said: "Let me write Union at the top of that page, and you may write below it whatever else you please." Mr. President, it is a sad contemplation that it was not then written, for it would have saved many a tear, many a grave, and many a home. Aye, could the recording angel have dropped a tear upon the scene and blotted out forever all that followed; but the hour had not arrived; the decree had not been written.

To-day, Mr. President, we rejoice that we can read written upon the canopy of our country that glorious word "Union," a word so cherished by the world's noblest patriots and so revered by us all. It was not written upon that sheet of paper, but it stands to-day written in the blood of the Union soldiers; and I ask in the name of the dead, and I ask, as I catch inspiration from our brothers' blood that cries out from the ground, let us write beneath that word simply gratitude, substantial gratitude, in practical provision for those who made it possible for you and me to see written there "Union."

Again, Mr. President, I would answer the miser's cry, that the pension roll is too large, by reminding him that we would deserve no credit did we make no sacrifices. The question of the hour is, Is it our duty? And we can not measure duty by the unit of the dollar. When our country called for volunteers, "Are you able and willing to fight?" was the extent of the inquiry. His name was entered upon that roll, his knapsack was strapped about him; he turned from the sweet companionship of home, mother, wife, and sweetheart to the association of his gun. He did not negotiate upon the price; he was not fighting for money, for individual fame, but for the preservation of this our glorious Union.

I ask you—and let this question be forever written upon the records; let it echo along the corridors of time; let it appeal to every heart—who was it made imperishable and indissoluble this our glorious Union? It was the blood of the Union soldier that cemented the stones erected by the fathers of the Constitution; and they are not asking for the "last drop of blood, and the last pound of flesh," but are asking for an equitable distribution of the fruits of their handiwork.

Mr. President, this resolution provides that he be paid $12 per month after reaching the age of 62 and making application for same. This will be a scanty living; even then the wolf will howl close by. After the age of 62 few men, especially those who have undergone the hardships of war, are able to do manual labor. Many of these are to-day worthy; many of these are at this hour suffering for the necessaries of life. "The birds of the air have nests, and the foxes have holes," but many of our comrades have not where to lay their heads. You may answer me that there are many pension statutes now upon the records. Yes, and they are so constructed, as you will see by illustrations in the appendix, which I ask leave to print as a part of my remarks, that it is as "hard for a camel to go through the eye of a needle" as it is for a Union soldier to pass muster through the technicalities and red-tape humbuggery of the pension statutes. He must pass through a fiery furnace as galling as a political aspirant imagines the civil service requirements to be. Yes, Mr. President, he must stand every kind of an examination but a post-mortem one, and many of them have long since become subjects for the doctor's knife waiting at our door for that relief which never came. Mr. President, I believe this resolution will meet with the hearty approval of a brave and generous people. I know it will meet with the approval of our conscience.

I said, Mr. President, in the beginning that this measure was not partisan or sectional. I hope and believe that I have touched a higher and nobler chord than partisanship; I feel sure that I have invited you to a sweeter and holier atmosphere than sectionalism. I thank the God who has so abundantly blessed our glorious country that you and I have lived to see the curtain rung down upon the tragic state of the secession war. We have seen the red billows of that awful drama spanned by the arm of American patriotism, and by that inspiration this moment reflected from the beautiful and sunlit slopes of our Arlington—once dedicated to sectionalism, but to-day, under this holier and sweeter dispensation, receiving in its bosom the sons of those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray.

I hear the death knell of sectionalism echoing from the heights of San Juan Hill, where the intrenched foe and the burning July sun of a tropical sky could not wither the love for one flag, one country, and one Constitution; and when the crimson tide had rolled back and the smoke of battle had cleared away in the embrace of death lay the sons of those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray. How inspiring to those who were participants in that great struggle to watch the dead borne from that battlefield; follow each to his last resting place; and yonder, Mr. President, in some far-off Southern State, see that little graveyard near the old church; read the inscription upon a plain, rude stone, which tells where sleeps a Confederate soldier, wrapped in his Confederate gray, and about him the flag for which he died.

A new grave is being opened; the once young wife returns to-day to that sacred mound, now an aged mother. Twice has life been darkened to her by its sad pilgrimage to this hallowed spot. To-day it is the son, who, on her last visit, was a babe at her breast. As the casket is lifted from the hearse and is opened by the side of a new-made grave, that all that is earthly may receive a mother's kiss, and as the coffin closes with a mother's tears bedewing, not the grave, but the Stars and Stripes, by the ashes of a Confederate father we lay to-day all that is mortal of a Union soldier; and side by side the blue and the gray, the father and the son, bathed with a devoted wife's and mother's tears, will sleep to answer the final call.

Mr. President, were one to rise from the dead the evidence of reunion could not be stronger, and the loyalty of that section once in rebellion could not be better proven.

Mr. President, that this resolution is not sectional—I believe and I speak as one who knows the Southern sentiment—that it will find there, if not here, a hearty approval. I believe that we have lived to see a full realization of the prophetic words uttered by that immortal statesman, patriot, and philanthropist, Abraham Lincoln, more than forty years ago, when the clouds of sectionalism hung in somber gloom; when the fiery serpents of discord played about the horizon; when the earth trembled beneath his feet and the air was rent with the discordant notes of "Union and Disunion," like the majestic oak, baring its breast to the beating storm, and rising resplendent in all the glory of its majestic greatness, surveying the field, and calmly counting the cost, he said:

> We are not enemies, but friends; we must not be enemies; though passion may have strained it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as assuredly they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

Mr. President, I to-day hand you the golden cord stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to your own living heart and hearthstone, and I trust the batteries may be awakened by the better angels of our nature, and the electric spark of patriotism carry the glad message to every home and gladden every hearthstone all over this broad land.

Mr. President, it will disturb no slumbering ashes of sectionalism, for the threads of the blue and the gray have been rewoven in our national loom of patriotism; and from this, our nation's capital, I turn my eyes to behold the blue sky of our Southland; I find there New England capital erecting cotton mills on fields once crimson with the world's best and noblest blood! The sword has been transformed into the plowshare; her wounded side is healed, the hand once red to-day wields the hammer and the sledge, and the echo resounding from her splendid industrial development is the glorious evidence of one imperishable and indestructible Union. With prosperity at home, with prestige abroad, we can defend the honor of our flag; either on land or on sea, alone or accompanied by the Constitution, for it is our flag. By American valor it will hover as a guardian angel above the graves of our valiant dead, and between it and dishonor every Southern sword will leap from its scabbard and by its side every Southern hero will proudly die.

Mr. President, those two great armies added luster and glory to each other; they have erected an imperishable monument to American valor, American chivalry, and American patriotism. We would not pluck one flower from the garland that festoons the memory of the one, and we know that no star will ever fade from the immortal crown of the other. Again, Mr. President, I would impress upon you that the time has arrived, the hand points to the hour on the dial, when this resolution should be enacted into statute. Forty years will have passed since the last gun was fired, and, in the light of precedent, by the guidance of humanity, no member of this body can justify opposition to a measure fraught with impartial justice and duty to our comrades.

I said, Mr. President, that it would not meet with opposition from our Southern friends, for there, almost without financial ability, they have set us the example; and for myself, with all my heart I approve and applaud the magnanimity of those Southern States, rising as they have from the ashes of desolation and ruin, who, from their scanty treasuries, are from year to year increasing and enlarging their pensions to the survivors of the lost cause. They are giving more in proportion than is this great Government, and their gifts are not surrounded with the cobweb of technicalities; no pension bureau to maintain; no medical boards and special examiners; no secret-service watchmen; no judicial bodies nor executive councils to sit in judgment; and, above all, no paupers' petitions to be presented.

I hand you here, Mr. President, this beautiful and appropriate New Year's greeting by the Commissioner of Pensions to his fifteen hundred colaborers. Read it and weigh it, and its very truth argues, tenfold greater than I, why all this red tape, all this retinue, all this army of doctors and special examiners should cease to be a charge upon the bounty due to the Union soldiers; and, Mr. President, the passage of this resolution would dispense with a greater part of all the laborers engaged in such momentous duties as are set out in this New Year's greeting, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

A NEW YEAR'S GREETING.

To my Coworkers in the Pension Bureau:

There are no places in the Government employ which require a higher order of ability than in the Pension Bureau. A knowledge of law, of medicine, and of military affairs are required in the adjudication of pension claims. The duties are not in their nature clerical, but are in their nature judicial. The employees of the Pension Bureau should constitute the élite corps of the civil service in Washington. I hope it will be so. There are men in the Pension Bureau who have led brigades. There are men who are capable of filling high legislative, executive, and judicial positions. There are not 1,500 people associated together on earth anywhere with a higher sense of commercial honor. I do not believe that there is in the Government employ any class who work more constantly. There are none who work more loyally and none more conscientiously. I wish them to know that I have confidence in them, and that, having become acquainted with them, I trust them and believe in them, and I wish them to think as much of me as I do of them.

The work done during the past calendar year shows an increase over that done the year before. All work should be done carefully and judicially on cold evidence and cold law, and nothing should be hasty and careless; but I wish that the number of adjudications might be increased during the coming year.

We will not run out of work, because Congress will keep us busy. There are more claims pending to-day than there were six months ago.

In closing I wish to thank my deputies and personal staff for their hearty and loyal support, and I wish to express my admiration for the industry and ability of the division and section chiefs—every one of them; and I wish to express my gratitude to my fellow-workers in the Bureau for the skillful and conscientious manner in which they are discharging their duty.

I wish them all a happy New Year.

E. V. WARE, Commissioner.

JANUARY 1, 1903.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, there are no laws upon the statute books needing revision more than our pension statutes. There are many; they were passed at different times, and to meet conditions as they arose. They should be examined and revised, and repealed by one general statute embodying all the law upon that subject as to who should be pensioned, what should be the basis of his claim, and the mode of procedure; and, for God's sake, let his claim rest upon his record on the battlefield rather than upon his hospital report. All know how easy it was, and how fearlessly some could march in a hospital charge; we could be our own captain, both giving and executing the command, with nothing to fear save the dangers incident to a doctor's prescription.

Yes, Mr. President, we find almost as many doctors to-day in the Pension Office passing on cases as we found in all the hospitals healing the wounds and binding the broken members during the war. Why should a corps of learned doctors be maintained to determine from the records whether the poor Union soldier is suffering and disabled from rheumatism contracted from 1861 to 1865, or subsequently thereto? Does it make his pains greater or his needs less? Does it lessen the country's duty? Was he a soldier? Is his name written upon the roll of that immortal band? Was he honorably discharged? Is he disabled? Does he need his country's aid? Is he 62 years of age? No learned surgeon, no trained jurist, no skilled diplomat need be summoned to render judgment, to pass upon legal technicalities, or unravel the mysteries of human anatomy.

Preserved sacred at the War Department is the roll of his enlistment. Laid near his mother's prayer book will be found that parchment showing his honorable discharge. In the family Bible will be found the record of the soldier's advent into this world. The name upon the roll, the date of enlistment, and the discharge, when the three are laid together, you meet the only requirement, the only demand, a grateful people should exact. Our pension system was never intended to depopulate the almshouses of the country, nor was it intended to become a snare and a delusion; but it is a law of compensation, founded upon consideration, to be prosecuted by the highest principles of human justice and executed with patriotism.

Mr. President, do our present statutes measure up to this standard? By them we must stand or fall. To-day, Mr. President, I hold up before the world; yes, by the light of the twentieth century, amid the din and roar of your boasting patriotism, the braggadocio of your country's greatness, while that vast army of Union veterans, decrepit and infirm, weary over the long march of life, and knocking at the door, are passing away "unwept, unhonored, and unsung." They are the same ones who bared their breast to the bayonet, that this very Capitol that shelters you and me might not be destroyed. Let this commission be appointed; let it assume the task that will appeal to duty and to patriotism, and not to partisanship, nor to sectionalism. Let its members be men who can not be swerved from duty by the cheer of the demagogue or the groans of the miser, and recommend to the next Congress such a measure as will simplify our present complex system, and broaden the pedestal of our philanthropy.

I believe, Mr. President, while I am wedded to no particular number of days—I believe when the soldier served ninety days and was honorably discharged, and has reached the age of 62, he should receive from this Government not less than $12 per month. This will give him a few of the necessities and none of the luxuries of life. It is small to the individual, and the aggregate would never be felt by this people. It is not wasted. It is not squandered. Can human genius devise a more appropriate outlay for the accumulated surplus? It would prove a generous method of redistribution.

You ask would I place the soldier who served but ninety days on equality with the one who served from one to four years? For answer, Mr. President, I point you to the beautiful parable of the vineyard. I want no higher guidance—you should ask no other. Let us dispense with that large roll of pension agents whose salaries amount to $72,000 a year; with clerks who are paid $415,164.31; rent for the different agencies, $9,480; contingent expenses, $29,769; and close the door upon the the army of examining surgeons, paid $191,123.85, together with traveling expenses aggregating $502,442.11; this costly paraphernalia of examining soldiers, $1,808,856.

This vast sum is multiplied many times over by the salaries of clerks and other employees. All these could be dispensed with or the greater part of them. And, again, Mr. President, when you examine the course of procedure you discover not only this enormous expense to the Government, but how slowly this great body moves. Many a soldier files his claim, and long before it is reached he has passed over the river and filed a claim elsewhere. Nearly forty years have come and gone; 861,076 applications are on file; of these 470,850 have been allowed, leaving nearly 400,000 not acted on. At this rate it will require eighty years to complete the roll, and when completed there will be none left to answer it.

I have endeavored, Mr. President, merely to drive the entering wedge. I may not live to see the work this day begun finished; I may have joined the ranks of many of the battle-scarred veterans who have gone before; but while I do live I feel that I can dedicate the remainder of this lease of life to no better purpose than in some way to alleviate the wants of my comrades in arms. Let one decree, one verdict, and one judgment adjudicate the claims of our soldiers! Dispense with forms and ceremonies! Remove the clogs of tardy justice! Open wide the door under the command, "Bring your family Bible in one hand, your enlistment and your discharge in the other." The record is then spread out before you; and this would be all the evidence needed as the basis of a pension.

I realize, Mr. President, that in this busy age legislation of this kind is hard to find lodgment; that measures purely humanitarian or patriotic should yield to the demands of commercialism; that the demands of the business man are paramount to all others, and that measures like this should sit supinely by and wait for a more fitting season. Mr. President, all this glitter may not be gold, and when tried might prove but "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal." There may come an awakening from this beautiful dream of commercialism. I fully realize that never before in all history were the wheels of industry moving with such rapidity as now. Fortunes are developing like sparks flashed from some heated iron. The whole world is speeding headlong. The lightnings of heaven are bearing our burdens, transmitting our thoughts, and molding our fortunes.

Into what station we will land only the great engineer, God, can tell. To Him alone doth the searchlight upon the engine show the track beyond the curve. Danger may lie before us. This splendid industrial life may be threatened by foes within or foes without. The very life of the nation itself may again be endangered. Under such a condition, where would you turn? To your commercialism? No; you would turn to the thousands of loyal and patriotic citizens who are ready to lay down life for country. Would such a resolution as the one I am discussing be deemed inappropriate then? You would gladly hug it to your breast, not as a shield, but as an inspiration to the common soldier. Mr. President, the veterans of the sixties are asking no more, they should be content to ask no less, of the Government than has been given to the veterans of the Mexican war. Compare the two wars—one, almost a bloodless journey into the city of Mexico; the other, four long years, whose every pathway was marked by blood and carnage ere the city of the Confederacy was reached. One was to extend the flag, the other to save it. Will you give to the one and deny the other?

Mr. President, we are abundantly able, with more gold in our Treasury than was ever within the vaults of any government on earth before. Our rapid growth and development and the splendor of our genius stand the wonder and study of mankind. Mr. President, the harvest is plentiful, and the laborers must by the laws of nature grow fewer each year. Over the span of forty years many of our comrades will have marched in triumph to that final victory. Let our gratitude cheer the hearts and our bounty brighten the pathway of the survivors. In this our hour of financial triumph, when the oceans touch hands with arms of steel; when every hill and valley is musical with the spirit of our national industry; when the breakers of the sea are bending beneath the burden of our exports; when our surplus is rising higher and higher day after day, until the very bars are bursting with its weight, let us do something else than turn the Union veteran from our door.

Yes, my countryman, let us shake off the frost that chills the spirit of our national patriotism, and by the memory of their noble sacrifices and by that sweet communion with the shadows of our valiant dead, regild the staff of the flag with our loyal love, touch with sacred hand each glittering star, and with filial devotion dedicate anew our lives around the altar made sacred with its folds. Our obligation will not have been paid until the sentinel of the law has sheathed his sword, the barred doors have been loosed, the soldier-proof statutes have been repealed, the army of pension employees disbanded, and one general law embracing the pension system enacted, with the right to pension based upon actual and honorable service in the Army, with a fixed age applying to all alike; and with no other record than the applicant's enlistment and his honorable discharge. When we have gathered the Union veterans from the hedges and the highways, when we have provided a balm in Gilead for every one, when each of them shall live by a nation's generosity, as evidence of a nation's gratitude and patriotism, we can fold our arms and, looking back upon duty well done, say, as did the Hero of Calvary, "It is finished."

APPENDIX.

PENSION LAWS.

The pension laws of the United States comprise a body of special acts, provisions contained in the Revised Statutes, and joint resolutions of Congress, and are published in a volume of about 200 pages, including rules of practice, and procedure, and forms. These laws are a sort of patchwork, covering a long period of years, and embrace:

(a) One hundred and twenty-five sections of the Revised Statutes, often amended or modified.

(c) Provisions in 28 appropriation bills.

No attempt has been made to revise or codify the pension laws since 1873, although several attempts have been made in that direction in Congress. These laws have been described as—

"So heterogeneous, fragmentary, and scattered (many provisions of vital importance being found obscurely placed in long and cumbersome appropriation acts), and yet so mutually interdependent as to be extremely difficult of access and comprehension without some authoritative systematic grouping." (Report of Committee on Revision of the Laws, H. R., February 1, 1896, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, Report No. 219.)

"* * * They consist of many separate acts, framed with little reference to each other, and often giving rise to perplexing questions, such as the question whether pension accrued but not paid at the death of a pensioner shall go to his widow and minor children, or in payment of expenses of last sickness or burial, or be paid in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to the legal representatives of the deceased pensioner, or shall lapse." (Report of the Commissioner of Pensions, June 30, 1893.)

"Since the passage of the general law of July 14, 1862, there have been numerous laws amendatory, special and general, with the many rulings and decisions interpreting the laws, until the whole system is a most complex and wonderful network or labyrinth of laws and legal opinions, to the end that a precedent may be cited for any action of this Bureau." (Report of the Commissioner of Pensions, June 30, 1898.)

TWO SYSTEMS UNDER WHICH PENSIONS GRANTED.

There are two systems—or a dual set of laws—under which pensions may be granted:

(a) Acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1873.

(b) Act of June 27, 1890, as amended by act of May 9, 1900.

The recent legislation is more liberal in that it grants pensions for conditions not due to the service, as under previous acts. But these dual laws serve to complicate the entire system and to produce inequalities in some cases.

Illustration.—Under existing laws a woman who marries a soldier pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, is not entitled to a pension as widow unless she were married to the soldier prior to the passage of the act in question, whereas the woman who marries a soldier pensioned under the general law, and thereafter becomes a widow, is entitled to a widow's pension.

Varying conditions.—Under the act of June 27, 1890, as amended by the act of May 9, 1900, it must be shown that the widow is without means of support other than her daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $350 per year. But the widow may have an income of $250 a year when her case is examined, and the year after, through reverses, or ill health, may be penniless and in need of the pension.

Grant of invalid pensions under two systems.—Under the act of July 14, 1862, as amended March 3, 1873, pensions were granted for invalids only for causes of service origin; but under the act of June 27, 1890, pensions were granted for disability which incapacitates for earning a support.

"The Department's interpretation of the law (June 27, 1890) has been that under said act pension is provided only in cases when incapacity to labor joins with incapacity to earn a support. I am free to say that the practice has never been to inquire into the capacity of the claimant to earn a support." (Commissioner of Pensions, June 30, 1899, p. 40.)

If no inquiry is made as to the capacity of a man to earn a support, no inquiry ought to be made as to the net income of a widow so as to prevent her from securing a pension.

Again, the practice, just noted, is not in accordance with law, and may be varied at the caprice of a Commissioner.

Illustrations under dual systems. (Commissioner of Pensions, June 30, 1899, p. 40.)

"A claimant may have a pensionable status of $10 or $12 per month for disabilities incurred in service, viz, he may be suffering from deafness, rheumatism, hernia, catarrh, or other disability. The same claimant may have, since the war, lost a leg or an arm, or have become stricken with paralysis or other severe disability (not of service origin), and these disabilities can not be added to or combined with his pensioned disabilities to increase his rate in excess of $12 per month. Thus the two separate and distinct systems of pensioning (both for disability alone), one for disability of service origin, the other for disability regardless of origin, afford a wide field for comparison and misunderstanding."

"As a further illustration showing the effect of the two systems of granting pensions created by the laws, a case may be cited where a claimant becomes totally blind from causes incident to his service. The law provides a pension in this case of $72 per month. In the same village another claimant became totally blind from causes not connected with the service, and the law grants him only $12 per month. The community, not being familiar with the legal rights of the two claimants, can not understand why one of these men receives a higher rate of pension than the other for the same disability, and the Pension Bureau is usually held responsible. Few stop to inquire into the facts which confer title in the different cases and to ascertain the fact that these conditions are created by law."

SPECIFIC OBJECTIONS TO PENSION LAWS.

A. Marriage and divorce.—Act of August 7, 1882, provides that marriages shall be proven in pension cases to be legal marriages according to the law of the place where the parties resided at the time of marriage or at the time when the right of pension accrued.

Section 4705, Revised Statutes, provides that widows of colored and Indian soldiers may receive a pension "without other evidence of marriage than satisfactory proof that the parties were joined in marriage by some ceremony deemed by them obligatory," and have lived together as man and wife.

In Maryland, where the common-law marriage is not recognized, a widow of excellent repute—but not married according to law—was refused a pension, yet pensions in the same State are granted to colored people and Indians.

The Secretary of the Interior has recommended the passage of an act for "the admission of evidence to prove marriages for pensionable purposes by a standard which will be uniform throughout the entire jurisdiction of the United States." (1900, p. 62.)

B. Widows' claims.—Act of June 7, 1888, repealed all limitations as to date of filing application in cases of widows of deceased soldiers and sailors, and made their pensions commence from the date of the death of the husband.

"No pension legislation that has ever been enacted has been so fruitful of fraudulent practices as the act of June 7, 1888." (Commissioner of Pensions, 1900, p. 30.)

The same officer denounces the act as one "that encourages crime and holds out inducements for the filing of fraudulent claims."

Several cases are cited where, under this act, pensions had been, or were about to be, granted up to $4,000, yet discovered to be fraudulent.

C. Inequalities under laws.—a. Increase.—Act June 16, 1880, grants pensions to those who were then receiving a pension of $50 per month under act June 18, 1874, should have the same increased to $72 per month from June 17, 1878. But the act applied only to those who, on the 16th of June, 1880, were entitled to the benefits of the act of June 18, 1874. The act made no provision for the cases of persons who, by the increase of their disabilities, should after June 16, 1880, become so disabled as to be entitled to the benefits of the act of June 18, 1874. The result of this is that those who, since June 16, 1880, have become so disabled as to require the aid and attendance of a second person because of total and permanent helplessness receive a pension of $50 per month, while those who, on the 16th of June, 1880, were receiving a pension for disability of this degree are now on the roll at the rate of $72 per month.

b. Loss of hand or foot.—Act of August 4, 1886, provides a pension of $30 per month for the loss of a hand or foot. Under the proviso to the same act the pension for a disability one-half that produced by the loss of a hand or foot is $9 per month. For a disability equivalent to the loss of a hand or foot, the pension for the period since March 3, 1883, is $24 per month. A disability not equivalent to the loss of a hand or foot is pensioned at such proportional part per month of $18 as the disability bears to that which would be caused by the loss of a hand or foot. It is desirable that there should be in all cases a fair proportion between the pension and the extent of the disability.

c. Discrimination against Navy.—Act March 3, 1877, directs that the act which forbids payment of pension money to any persons, widows, etc., who aided in the rebellion shall not apply to persons who afterwards voluntarily enlisted in the Army of the United States, and who were disabled or contracted disease. This law makes no provision for persons who under like circumstances enlisted in the Navy.

d. Relief for total disability.—Act of March 3, 1883, grants a rate of $30 per month to those so disabled as to be incapacitated for performing any manual labor, yet the act of March 4, 1890, awards $72 per month to those who require the regular aid and attendance of another person.

"There are many claimants," says the Commissioner of Pensions, "who are entirely incapacitated for performing manual labor and who periodically require the aid and attendance of other persons, but who are unable to establish the fact of the requirement of constant aid and attendance."

e. Improper ratings.—Special consideration ought to be allowed, under act of June 27, 1890, on account of deafness. But it appears that an improper and unjust rule is followed by the Pension Bureau in this respect. For, in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for 1902, at page 85, it is said:

"In cases where deafness is the only disability found to exist, a rate can not be accorded under the act of June 27, 1890, if the deafness exists in a degree less than severe in both ears. Deafness of one ear is not rateable under this act, because incapacity to perform manual labor to a degree which produces inability to earn support does not result from that cause."

A man who is deaf, even to some degree, is, under the sharp competition of the present time, under a great disadvantage, and often finds it very difficult to secure anything save inferior work. He can not get work as a carpenter, or in a mill, or on railways, where good hearing is essential, and often to the safety of fellow employees. It is clear, therefore, that the present rule of the Pension Bureau must work a great injustice to men who have become deaf to a certain degree as a result of army service.

f. Dependent parents.—The law granting pension to a mother or father on account of the death of a son requires that, to give title, the condition of dependence should have existed at the date of the son's death, and have been recognized by him. If, since the son's death, the parents have fallen into a condition in which they require aid in providing a support for themselves, the law, as it now exists, affords them no relief. The Committees on Pensions of the Senate and House of Representatives have established a rule under which cases in which a condition of dependence exists at the time of application to Congress are recommended for relief by special act, and Congress has acted in accordance with the recommendation of the committee. (Commissioner of Pensions, 1889, p. 72.)

g. Widow marries and conceals fact.—In some cases a widow remarries and conceals the fact, and thus prevents her children from drawing the pension. Legislation to cure this evil should be effected.

h. Where widow kills husband.—Section 4817 of the Revised Statutes should be so amended as to debar from succession any person who has been guilty of feloniously causing the death, etc., of a pensioner.

MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS.

Act of May 9, 1900, sec. 2, provides:

"That all persons * * * suffering from any mental or physical disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which so incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support, shall * * * be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month, and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of disability to earn a support; and in determining such inability each and every infirmity shall be duly considered, and the aggregate of the disabilities shown rated * * *."

Is it any wonder that, under such regulations, a great many of the nation's heroes pass away with their claims unadjudicated, or the debt of honor unrepaid?

As an evidence of the difficulties which confront an application for pension a case may be cited of a medical examination reported by the Commissioner of Pensions in 1898. An applicant, under a test case, was examined by four medical boards of three members each within forty-eight hours and under the same conditions. One board could find no ratable disability; another found a ratable disability and estimated it at $8 per month; another board found disability and carefully described it and rated it at $17 per month; the other board made an equally careful examination and estimated the claimant's disability as third grade, $24 per month.

The Report of the Commissioner of Pensions, 1898, page 11, further says:

"There is much complaint among pensioners, and very just cause for such, by reason of the lack of uniformity of ratings for the same or like disabilities in cases of different claimants. This complaint has always existed and always will with our present system and established practice, and it can not be remedied without radical change of system."

The Report of the Commissioner of Pensions, 1880, says:

"The present system of adjudication, based almost wholly upon ex parte testimony, is admittedly defective."

Opinion of Secretary of the Interior (Report for 1901, p. 71):

"The Commissioner (of Pensions) quotes from the annual reports of his predecessors as far back as 1868 to show that the same unsatisfactory conditions have existed ever since that date with regard to the system of adjudicating pension claims on ex parte testimony and the reports of examining surgeons made under existing practice."

Report for 1902, page 58:

"The present method of examining applicants for pension, the Commissioner states, is uncertain, expensive, and unsatisfactory in its results, the personnel of the various medical boards being liable to outside control and political dictation."

DIFFICULTY OF SECURING A PENSION.

Under the present complex system it is about as difficult to secure a pension, in the cases chiefly presented to the Bureau, as it is to win a case in court. In fact, an application for a pension is placed in about the same position of a suitor in a court of justice.

a. Medical examinations.—"The medical examinations form the basis, the very foundation, of our whole system, as all pensions to soldiers (under the act of July 14, 1862, and the act of March 3, 1873—the general laws) are based upon the disabilities incurred in the service, while those pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, must show, by medical examination, that their disabilities (not of service origin) are such that they are incapacitated from making a living by manual labor; and further, having once established a ratable disability, future increases depend upon medical examinations." (Report Commissioner of Pensions, 1898, p. 11.)

b. Causes of rejection.—"During the fiscal year 1899 the number of claims rejected was 107,919. As there were only 89,054 certificates issued during the year, it will be noted that the number of rejections exceeded the number of allowances.

"In discussing the different causes of rejection of original claims they may be divided into 3 different classes:

"(1) Claims for which no provision is made by existing laws;

"(2) Claims in which the claimant is unable to furnish the necessary proofs; and

"(3) Claims which are fraudulent." (Commissioner of Pensions, 1899, p. 27.)

"Many claims are filed for 'new disabilities' alleged as of service origin. The great majority of such claims must necessarily be disposed of by rejection." (Commissioner of Pensions, 1901, p. 41.)

c. Number of appeals.—Data respecting the number of appeals filed will further indicate some of the difficulties of securing a pension:

"That some idea of the enormous increase in the number of these appeals may be obtained, it will be sufficient to state that for a period of fifteen years prior to January 1, 1881, the average number of such appeals for each year amounted to 286. Since that date the number or increase has been large and constant, as follows:

1883	1,097	1887	1,941

(Report of Secretary of Interior, 1888, p. 84.)

There were pending on July 1, 1896, 1,069 appeals and 28 motions for reconsideration of departmental action. During the year 5,592 appeals and 270 motions were filed; of these 4,851 appeals and 224 motions were disposed of, leaving pending on July 1, 1897, 1,810 appeals and 74 motions for reconsideration.

One thousand two hundred and fifty-seven appeals and 69 motions for reconsideration were on the docket on June 1; since that date 3,056 appeals and 309 motions have been filed.

On October 2 there were pending 2,950 appeals and 200 motions for reconsideration of departmental action, 1,393 appeals and 285 motions having been disposed of since June 1, 1897. (Report of Secretary of the Interior, p. 24.)

The number of appeals on the docket April 15, 1893, was 4,965. Since that date 17,755 new cases have been filed, making a total of 22,720 to be acted upon by the Department. (Report of Secretary of the Interior, 1896, p. 31.)

"* * * During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1898," is "unprecedented in any one year in the history of the board of pension appeals since its organization, fifteen years ago; * * * an examination of the records will show that it is in excess of the number filed in any two years. It is also shown that the proportionate increase has continued since July 1, 1898, and that on October 1, 1898, there were pending 11,820 appeals and motions for reconsideration." (Report of Secretary of Interior, 1898, p. 73.)

The following summary shows the action taken by the board of review in original claims during the past four years:

Year.	Admitted.	Rejected.	Total.
1898	52,648	48,175	100,823
1899	37,077	46,345	83,422
1900	40,645	44,670	85,315
1901	50,904	48,361	99,265
Total	181,274	187,551	368,825

APPEALS.

The Department, through the board of appeals, acted in 5,428 appealed claims during the year; affirmed the action of the Bureau in 4,471 cases, and reversed the Bureau findings in 546 cases. (Report of Secretary of Interior, 1901, p. 26.)

d. Pension court.—To increase the complications attending the administration of pension matters, the Secretary of the Interior has recommended the creation of a pension court, similar to the Court of Claims, for the review of the action of the Commissioner of Pensions or of the action of the Secretary. (See Report of the Secretary of Interior, 1900, 63; id., 1901, 73.)

RECOMMENDATIONS AS TO REVISION.

It is recommended that a pension be granted to every soldier and sailor who did substantial service during the war in the Army or Navy and was honorably discharged therefrom, and who, being dependent on his daily labor for support, is now or may hereafter be disabled from procuring subsistence by such labor. A due regard to its own dignity and character should prevent the Government from allowing any of the men who fought to maintain the Union to suffer from want when they have become so incapacitated. It is well known to all our people that many who were never disabled in the fight or the service were yet those who met the greatest dangers of the war and who served continuously and faithfully. That Providence saved them from wounds or disease, and that their strong constitutions withstood the hardships of the field, give no reason why they should be left disregarded and unsupported now. The pension is paid by the Government in rewards for past services to those who fought to maintain its existence. It has the sanction of self-preservation, which no government in the treatment of its veterans can safely ignore. The preservation of the nation for which these men fought and endured so much to secure has given to all our people a wonderful degree of prosperity and an almost unlimited ability to pay any obligations honor imposes. (Secretary of the Interior, 1889, p. 67.)

The Commissioner recommends a codification of the pension laws, with such slight changes as will make them harmonious. At present they consist of many separate acts, framed with little reference to each other, and often give rise to perplexing questions in the settlement of claims for accrued pensions, etc. (Secretary of the Interior, 1893, p. 29.)

Legislation is recommended which will define with more certainty the pensionable rights of minor children under the act of June 27, 1890, in those cases where the soldier dies leaving no widow surviving. The construction of the act on this point now rests in much doubt, and the title of such children is sustained only by implication. (Secretary of the Interior, 1895, p. 28.)

Attention is invited to a bill described as "An act to codify and arrange the laws relating to pensions." The Commissioner strongly urges the passage of this bill on account of its admirable arrangement, and also on account of the great advantage which will be derived from it, not only by the Bureau, but also by those with whom the Bureau has official dealings.

He (the Commissioner of Pensions) also calls attention to the fact that since the passage of the general puesion law of July 14, 1862, many laws, general and special, and many rulings and decisions interpreting the laws, have been rendered, until the system is a complete network of laws and legal opinions, and recommends the appointment of a commission to revise the pension laws and regulations governing the granting of pensions, in order to secure reliable, intelligent, and uniform practice in the future. In this recommendation I concur. (Secretary of the Interior, 1898, p. 71.)

An early revision and codification of the pension laws is, in my judgement, highly desirable, and I therefore earnestly commend the Commissioner's recommendations in the premises to the favorable consideration of Congress. (Secretary of the Interior, 1899, p. 44.)

The Commissioner again calls attention to his former recommendation as to the necessity for a thorough revision of the pension laws with a view of making their operation more uniform in character, and expresses the opinion that a commission should be appointed for that purpose, to the end that the benefits conferred in the way of pensions may be more equitably distributed among the beneficiaries. (Secretary of the Interior, 1900, p. 61.)

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have listened with great attention to the interesting and eloquent speech of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] on the subject of pensions. As I gathered the contention of the Senator, not having heard the first part of his speech, he has made a very earnest appeal for a service-pension law that would give a pension to every soldier who served a certain number of days in the late civil war.

Mr. President, that subject has been agitated for a good many years, and on the 12th day of May, 1902, the Committee on Pensions, of which I chance to be chairman, gave a protracted hearing to certain distinguished gentlemen interested in a bill which, if enacted into law, would have accomplished precisely what the Senator from West Virginia has argued in favor of. At that hearing it was stated by certain gentlemen, one of whom was Mr. John P. Donahoe, of Wilmington, Del., a distinguished soldier, that there are now 200,000 soldiers who had served in the civil war who are not on the pension roll. The Senator from West Virginia has surprised me by saying that there have been 861,076 applications; that 470,450 have been allowed, leaving 390,226 unacted on, or 190,226 more than was represented to the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. These figures came from the Pension Office.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that be so, the gentlemen who appeared before our committee and stated that there were 200,000 were 190,226 short of the actual number, according to the applications in the Bureau of Pensions. It seems to me there must be some mistake on that point.

Mr. President, the matter of service pensions has engaged the attention of the Congress of the United States during all its history, and I want, in a very few words, to give the record as to the dates when service pensions have been granted to survivors of the several wars.

The first general act passed granting pension for service only was approved March 18, 1818, or thirty-five years after the termination of the Revolutionary war. Its beneficiaries were required to be in indigent circumstances and in need of assistance. It will be observed that this was not a general service-pension law, but simply granted pensions to those who were in necessitous circumstances.

On May 15, 1828, or forty-five years after the close of the war, service pension was granted to those who served to the end of the war of the Revolution.

Under date of June 7, 1832, a general law was enacted pensioning all survivors who served not less than six months in said war. This act was passed forty-nine years after the close of the war.

The first law enacted granting pension on account of service in the war of 1812 was approved February 14, 1871, fifty-six years after the close of the war. Sixty days' service was required.

The period of service required under the act of February 14, 1871, was reduced to fourteen days by the act of March 9, 1878, which was passed sixty-three years after the close of the war.

On January 29, 1887, being thirty-nine years after the close of the Mexican war, an act was passed providing pension for soldiers and sailors who had had a service of sixty days, provided they were 62 years of age, or disabled, or dependent.

A subsequent act was passed, the date of which I do not now recall, increasing to $12 per month the pensions to soldiers of the Mexican war, who were on the roll under that service act, if they were in a condition of actual destitution. Under that amended act the pensions of about one-half of those on the roll have been increased from $8 to $12, and the other half remain on the roll at $8 at the present time.

On July 27, 1892, fifty years after the period included in the act, pensions were provided for those who served thirty days in the Black Hawk, Creek, Cherokee, and Florida wars with the Seminole Indians from 1832 to 1842.

Now it will be observed that practically all service-pension laws now on the statute books were passed about forty years after the close of the war; perhaps an average of forty-five years. So upon that basis the time is approaching for a service-pension law for the survivors of the civil law.

But, Mr. President, there is a matter which comes in to complicate this question materially, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country. On June 27, 1890, Congress in its wisdom passed what is known as the dependent pension bill, or, as it is more commonly designated, the act of June 27, 1890. To all intents and purposes that is a service-pension law, for the reason that it does not require the soldier to prove any disability incurred in the service, but simply to prove inability to perform manual labor. The rates were graded $6, $8, $10, and $12, so that a soldier who had served ninety days in the civil war and was totally disabled from manual labor would receive a pension of $12 per month. Those who were partially disabled would receive pensions of $6, $8, or $10, according to the degree of inability to perform manual labor.

Mr. President, under that law, which, as I have before said, is a practical service-pension law as far as it goes, $700,000,000 have been paid out of the Treasury of the United States to the soldiers placed on the roll under it. And in considering the question as to the desirability of now enacting a service-pension law—and on that point I am not to-day going to express an opinion either pro or con—we should not lose sight of the fact that the enormous amount of $700,000,000 has already been paid out under the act of June 27, 1890, to soldiers who are not required to prove, and in no single instance did they prove, the incurrence of the slightest disability in the military service of the United States, but merely proved that they had served the period of ninety days and were either partially or wholly disabled for the performance of manual labor.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know whether it is desirable to go further than we have gone at the present time in the matter of extending the pension laws. We do know that we are paying out to the soldiers of the civil war about $135,000,000 per year. We do know that we have paid out considerably more than $2,000,000,000 since the close of the civil war. We know that; and under existing conditions, notwithstanding the plethora of the public Treasury, notwithstanding the fact that we are a rich and powerful and prosperous nation, as the Senator from West Virginia has so ably argued, it is a very serious question for Congress to determine whether the time has come to very largely swell the annual appropriations for pensions.

If there are 200,000 soldiers remaining of that war who are not on the pension roll at the present time, and who shall be placed there under the proposition of the Senator from West Virginia at $12 per month, it will add an immediate amount of $28,800,000 to the pension appropriations. I presume it is not an exaggeration for me to say that men at the age of 62 years will average to live ten years, and, under that law, if they should live an average of ten years, it would take $288,000,000 to pay the expenses incurred by the passage of a bill of this kind.

But, Mr. President, that does not represent the entire amount that would be required. Under the act of June 27, 1890, which, as I have stated before, has resulted in an expenditure of $700,000,000 or thereabouts, there are thousands of men, tens of thousands, scores of thousands of men on the roll at six, eight, and ten dollars per month. A very small proportion of them are on the rolls at $12 per month, because those who receive $12 per month have been required to prove their absolute inability to perform manual labor.

So, as soon as we pass this proposition to place on the roll all the men who are not now pensioned at the rate of $12 per month, we would be compelled to increase the pension of all those under the act of June 27, 1890, from $6 to $12, from $8 to $12, and from $10 to $12, and there would be no possibility of our being able to resist that proposition.

But, Mr. President, I will go further. Under the general law there are perhaps 100,000 soldiers on the roll at $6, $8, and $10 per month. Many of those men, who have proved disabilities incurred in the service, were receiving the paltry sum of $2 and $4 per month until a few years ago we passed a law increasing the pension of all of them to $6 per month. But at the present time there are a great many thousands of men on the pension roll under the general law at $6, $8, and $10 per month, and the moment you pass a service-pension bill which will place these 200,000, or, as the Senator from West Virginia has put it, 390,000, soldiers on the pension roll at $12 per month, we will be compelled, of course, to increase to an equal amount the pensions of all those who are on the roll under the general law and who have proved the incurrence of disabilities in the service.

Mr. President, I take the risk of being misrepresented in this matter; it may be, and probably will be, said that I am an enemy to this proposed legislation; but, Mr. President, I think it may safely be said that if we should pass a service-pension bill to-day putting the survivors of the civil war on the roll at $12 a month, those who would necessarily be increased under the act of June 27, 1890, and the general law to a similar amount would at least double the appropriation we would be called upon to make to meet the proposed legislation of the Senator from West Virginia, and in considering this matter all the elements in the case should be taken into consideration.

Now, Mr. President, I felt it my duty as chairman of the Committee on Pensions to state this matter clearly to the Senate and to the country, that it may be perfectly understood what this proposed legislation means. I shall never be found obstructing any legislation in the interest of the veterans of the civil war that is reasonable and just, and I do not want to be understood as saying that I should oppose the proposed legislation if it was being seriously considered by the Congress of the United States. But we can not wink out of sight the fact that the proposed legislation will beyond a question add an immediate annual appropriation of at least $50,000,000 to the $140,000,000 that is now appropriated, and that we can not by any possibility avoid meeting that obligation if the views of the Senator from West Virginia regarding this matter shall prevail.

Mr. President, this is all I care to say.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the omnibus statehood bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GAMBLE. I will ask the junior Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me while I ask for the present consideration of Senate bill 7004.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the statehood bill be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I have said to the Senator from South Dakota, who seems to think it very important that his bill should pass to-day, that if it elicits no discussion I shall not object to its consideration. But I will not assent to-day to unanimous consent for the consideration of any other measure.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 7004) to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. QUARLES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SPOONER] is necessarily absent from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, there is one matter which has been brought to my attention about which I think those who favor the admission of Arizona as a State at this time ought to make some satisfactory explanation. What I say now I say more in the way of seeking information than of stating facts within my knowledge, but it has been asserted in the public press within very recent times that Arizona is engaged in an effort to repudiate some bonds which she ought to acknowledge and fund. If that be so, it would form, to my mind, an absolutely conclusive argument why Arizona should not now be admitted to statehood.

I do not assert that it is so, but, as I have understood from the press, and, indeed, from other information, the county of Pima, in Arizona, some years ago issued $150,000 of bonds to aid in the construction of a railroad. It voted to issue a much larger number of bonds, but before the work on the railroad ceased only $150,000 of bonds were called for. Those bonds were negotiated through the firm of Coler & Co., of New York, at the head of which is the Hon. Bird S. Coler, who was recently a candidate for governor of the State of New York, a gentleman whose character, of course, is beyond impeachment. The bonds were negotiated by this company, were sold all over the United States and in Europe, and are still outstanding.

Some time afterwards—and I think Senators will remember this part of the history—a memorial from the legislature of Arizona was sent here asking Congress to validate those Pima County bonds, it having been ascertained that they had been issued for railroad purposes when, according to the United States law, counties were only authorized to issue bonds for county purposes. The matter was presented here very strongly, as I remember it, and I remember hesitating about whether Congress ought to validate those bonds, but the Committee on Territories reported the bill favorably, and it was passed, validating those bonds.

About that time, either before or just after it, at the instance of the Territory of Arizona, an act was passed authorizing the funding into Territorial bonds of the indebtedness of the Territory and of county and municipal indebtedness, to be assumed by the Territory. So that up to this point we have the bonds validated and an act passed at the instance of the Territory of Arizona to fund those bonds into Territorial bonds, not authorizing it, but making it obligatory to do so.

Loan commissioners were appointed for that purpose, as I understand it, and they refused to recognize these bonds. Thereupon the bondholders brought suit, and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was decided in the one hundred and seventy-second volume of United States Reports, the contention being that they were not obligated for these bonds, because Congress could not validate them and make them legal bonds. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that the act validating them was effectual and good, and that the bonds were valid and legal bonds in the hands of the holders. The case was remanded to the courts of Arizona for further action in consonance with that opinion.

Then these loan commissioners set up some other objection to recognizing these bonds and funding them, one of which was that a certain act of Congress had repealed another act; and another was that the members of the loan commission had passed out of office after the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and therefore the then existing members were not bound by the decree of the court. That case has been argued in the Supreme Court of the United States and decided recently, but still these loan commissioners refuse to act; they are putting off action on one pretext and another, so that these Pima County bonds, which have been validated by Congress, which have been ordered by Congress to be refunded into Territorial bonds, which the Supreme Court of the United States has stated should be refunded into Territorial bonds, and which the supreme Territorial court of Arizona has directed to be refunded into Territorial bonds, are still outstanding, and no interest paid upon them.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Who are the loan commissioners to whom the Senator has referred? Are they authorities of the Territory?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. So I understand.

Mr. HALE. Are they created by the Territory?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understand so.

Mr. HALE. And is their action against the payment of these bonds representing the Territory?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. So I understand.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator will allow me to finish my statement, so that it will be all together, I shall be glad to answer any question if I can. I am almost through.

The question I want to ask, Mr. President, is this, whether, in the admission of the Territory of Arizona as a State, we are going to enable what is believed to be an effort to repudiate these bonds to become successful? I know that in the omnibus bill there is a provision that the debts and liabilities of said Territory of Arizona shall be assumed and paid by the State, but the Territorial officers at this present time are repudiating the obligation of the Territory to fund those bonds, and they are not yet debts of the Territory. That is being resisted, as I have said, against the act of Congress, against the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and against the decisions of the supreme court of the Territory of Arizona.

Does it not follow that if we admit Arizona as a State she will then be in a position to say these were not Territorial obligations at the time of admission, and the people holding these bonds, who, it is admitted, are innocent holders, have no redress? Now, I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I have heard it alleged—I do not know whether it is true or not, so I ask the Senator for information—that the railroad for which these bonds were issued was never built. Is that true or not true?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. A portion of it was not built; it was never entirely built, as I understand it—and I am asking rather for information myself than making any statement upon my own information which I can vouch for—but I understand the whole road was never completed. That whole question, however, was raised in the first case that came to the Supreme Court as a reason why these bonds should not be recognized. The court passed upon that specifically, and held that it made no difference as to the validity of the bonds whether the road was completed or not. You will find that decision in the one hundred and seventy-second volume of the United States Reports. It is the case of Utter v. Franklin.

Mr. HALE. The money was raised on the bonds?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly it was.

Mr. HALE. There is no question as to that?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. None whatever.

Mr. HALE. And paid over in good faith?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. And, whether it was appropriated and used for the completion of a railroad or not, the localities had the benefit of it?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The fact was this, as I understand: When so many miles of road had been completed, $50,000 of bonds should be issued; when so many more miles of railroad were completed, $50,000 of bonds should be issued; when another similar stretch of road was completed, $50,000 more should be issued, making a hundred and fifty thousand in all, and the company, or somebody, was unable to complete the road as had been anticipated.

Mr. HALE. But the money was paid in?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to say one word more in answer to the Senator from Maine? He says the community got the benefit of it. I do not know all the facts in the Arizona case. I simply know that it is a case where the railroad got the bonds and failed to build. I know of cases in the Southern States, and in the State of Missouri especially, where bonds were issued, fraudulently issued, and sold to innocent parties, perhaps—at least they claimed to be innocent; they were not innocent in point of fact, as I believe—and where counties were charged with hundreds of thousands of dollars for a railroad not one foot of which was ever built in the locality. Yet the United States Supreme Court has rendered judgment in favor of the bondholders; and in one noted case in Missouri the local officers have been imprisoned for a number of years in an effort to force them to pay what would absolutely bankrupt the county—bonds that were issued in the days gone by, and where not one foot of railroad was ever built and where no locality received any benefit from it.

If these be bonds of that kind, it seems strange to me that Senators should stand on this floor and object to the admission of a Territory because they think that perhaps after it gets to be a State it will not pay bonds of that character. From my standpoint, if that be this class of bonds, and I do not know that it is, it would be a very strong reason why I would vote to make it a State.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator if he has made up his mind as to what would be the effect upon these bonds of the admission of Arizona as a State; and if he has so made it up, I would ask him to give us the benefit of his judgment, in which we all have great confidence. The question I want to put is this: Will the change from a Territorial to a State government make any difference in the liability, for which the property of the Territory has become responsible, for an indebtedness already against it, if it has been or shall be declared to be a bona fide, actual, subsisting indebtedness?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am sorry not to be able to answer absolutely and accurately and conclusively in my own mind all the questions that are asked about this matter. I stated when I brought this subject to the attention of the Senate that I did so in order that those who were seeking the admission of Arizona as a State might give the Senate complete and full information on the subject.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was asking for the judgment of the Senator himself, he having evidently considered the matter.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I confess, Mr. President, that I do not see how the new State, under the existing condition of things and before these county bonds should have been actually recognized as a Territorial obligation, would be bound to pay them as an obligation of the Territory.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Do I understand that these bonds have already gone into judgment against the county issuing them?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I can not answer the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that the only way in which the court could pass on them—and I understand the court has declared that they are valid—is by an action brought on the bonds, and of course that action must have been against the makers of the bonds.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think so.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that be true, then if there is a judgment against any county in that Territory how will the fact that the Territory is admitted as a State prevent the issuance of a mandamus against the officers of that county requiring them to levy the proper tax to pay the judgment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As I said, I am merely stating this matter in order that the facts may, by some one who knows them, be fully explained to the Senate. My recollection is that the case which was brought was an application for a mandamus against the loan-fund commissioners requiring them to acknowledge these bonds as valid bonds. That, I think, is the nature of the case which was brought and came into the Supreme Court of the United States, but I am not absolutely certain of that.

Mr. McCUMBER. But in either instance the Senator does not think that changing the status of a Territory from a Territorial form of government to a State would change the liability of it, does he?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I believe, Mr. President, that the people of Arizona, represented by its officers, think that it will, and they intend to put this off until, as they hope, Arizona may be admitted, and then to set up the defense that it does.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut if it is a fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has at any time declared that these bonds were fraudulent?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has not. On the other hand, it has declared that they are valid.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My impression was that the first decision rendered by the Supreme Court was that the bonds were invalid; that they were fraudulent and void.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But that by reason of some act of Congress afterwards passed it was held by the Supreme Court, in a subsequent decision, that they were good.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] has anticipated what I desired to say in answer to the Senator from Connecticut. The Senator from Connecticut has been only partly informed, if I have not been misinformed. My information is that the county of Pima did issue some bonds to aid in the construction of a railroad. They were issued by the county of Pima, but the liability upon those bonds was resisted. It went into the courts. The case came in due time to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that there was no liability, because the bonds had been illegally issued.

Thereupon representatives of Arizona came here to Congress, and they succeeded in securing the enactment of the legislation to which the Senator from Connecticut has referred, according to which legislation the Territorial government was required to assume and pay the obligations of counties arising in this manner.

Subsequently there was litigation as to that, and then, in due course, there was rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States the decision to which the Senator has referred, to the effect that under that legislation the Territorial government had become liable. That decision was rendered only quite recently, and it is not being resisted. On the contrary, I am handed a telegram which has been received only to-day by the Delegate who represents Arizona in the House of Representatives. It is from the ex-attorney-general of Arizona, who was one of the counsel in this case, as I am told. I will read it:

Hon. M. A. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The only open question as to funding Coler bonds is whether the mandate of the United States Supreme Court includes payment of compound interest upon the interest coupons. This is the fault of his attorneys. No obstruction otherwise.

WILLIAM HERRING.

Mr. President, I am not acquainted with the details of this matter. It never occurred to me that even if the officials of a county should maladminister its affairs, and should improperly resist the payment of bonds which they had caused to be issued, the people of the whole Territory would be condemned as unfit to come into the Union of States; that they would be regarded as unfit to be treated as citizens of the United States and to be accorded State government.

It seems to me that the Senator from Connecticut is going a long way when he undertakes to arraign a whole people—a people who, it has been said by those opposing this measure, are as intelligent as any people that can be found in the United States, a people who are out there struggling to build up a Commonwealth, and who have accomplished that which excited the admiration and compliment of even the committee that visited them——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I see the force of the Senator's point, that the people of the whole Territory should not be made accountable for the acts of the inhabitants of a single county. But the Senator's statement itself shows that by the action of Arizona this matter passed from the consideration of the people of Pima County, and that on the motion of the people of Arizona Congress interposed and made it a Territorial matter and validated the bonds, not as Pima County, but as Territorial obligations, and that the Territory should assume them. So if there is anything in the point made by the Senator from Connecticut that the loan commissioners are delaying and holding off and declining to admit this liability, it is that the action of the loan commissioners is not the action of this one county, but of the Territorial government and of the inhabitants of the Territory.

The point, as I understand, is that under the provisions of this bill if the Territory is admitted as a State it assumes the Territorial obligations. There is delay and resistance and refusal to recognize them, not as county obligations, but as Territorial obligations. So the Senator's point that we are punishing a Territory for the act of the inhabitants of a county entirely falls. It has ceased to be a county matter, but is a matter of the entire Territory. Is not that the fact, I ask the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator from Maine will not settle it conclusively against me by appealing to some one on his own side to confirm it.

Mr. HALE. I was going to ask whether that is not the Senator's point.

Mr. FORAKER. That is what the Senator was doing.

What I wish to say in answer to the Senator's contention is that originally this was admittedly the liability of only one county, if it was the liability of anybody. It was not the liabilty of the Territorial government. It was not the liability of the people of the Territory. It was not the liability of any town or any municipality in Arizona, outside of the one county that had issued the bonds, and the Supreme Court held that it was not the liability of that county, but that the bonds had been unlawfully issued. That is something which is not peculiar to a frontier country. Matters of that kind sometimes happen in the old States, and they are liable to happen even in New England.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Now, when it has been held by the Supreme Court that there was absolutely no liability whatever, then the holders of the bonds came to the Congress of the United States and secured legislation which was characterized by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] in his speech the other day as of a most extraordinary and unusual character. I can not recall the exact language, but he commented on it most severely. It was legislation whereby the obligation of a county was saddled on the whole Territory.

Is it any wonder that the people of Arizona, who had never contracted this debt, should object and resort to the courts and seek to escape such a liability? It was their duty to do it—a liability which was saddled upon them because of the unlawful action of the representatives of one county. They would not have been justified, as we ordinarily regard such matters, in paying until they had put it to the test. Now, it turns out they were in error about it; that under the act of Congress they had become liable. I have not looked up the case, and am speaking upon information which has just been given me.

But I understand that through one court after another, until the Supreme Court of the United States was reached, that question was contested. The Supreme Court having decided that it was competent for Congress to impose upon the Territory of Arizona this liability of this one county, although unlawfully contracted, they say "that is the end of it; we are now preparing to pay it; there is no further resistance." And so it has become, by reason of this legislation of Congress and the decision of the Supreme Court, the debt of the Territory, and, being the debt of the Territory, it is provided for in this bill. And there can not be, and there is no disposition that there should be any longer any contention or delay in its payment beyond that indicated by the telegram I have read.

Mr. HALE. But I understand this movement upon Congress to validate these bonds and make them obligatory upon the Territory came from the Territory itself. The Senator says that the holders of the bonds came to Congress and involved the Territory. The movement, as I understand, was not from the holders of the bonds, but from the authorities of the Territory itself, asking that the Territory be made responsible.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I have not the record. I supposed it was the holders of the bonds who had asked that somebody might make the bonds good to them.

Mr. HALE. It came from the Territory itself.

Mr. FORAKER. Then if it was the people of Arizona who asked Congress to saddle it upon them in order that they might lawfully pay it, is it not highly creditable to the people of the Territory?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. But it disposes of the point of the Senator from Ohio that the bondholders themselves came here.

Mr. FORAKER. I supposed it was the bondholders, and I am informed that it was the bondholders primarily.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am just trying, if I can get any light, to find out how it is that when the Supreme Court has declared certain obligations to be fraudulent, anybody can validate them. That is the question. How can anybody, even Congress, validate a bond that has been issued fraudulently?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, this objection seems an entirely new one to the admission of Arizona as a State. The proposition as made by the Senator from Connecticut is——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to ask the Senator from Connecticut to cite again the case he spoke of as being reported in 172 United States?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is the case of Utter v. Franklin, to be found on page 416 of 172 United States.

Mr. FORAKER. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. RAWLINS. The proposition is that it has been claimed by certain bondholders that the Territory of Arizona is obligated to pay their bonds. The bonds were originally issued fraudulently by a county in Arizona.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I beg pardon, Mr. President. The bonds were not issued fraudulently. It is so stated on the floor; but before we get through with the matter I will show that there was no fraud in the issue of the bonds.

Mr. RAWLINS. I used the word "fraudulent" in the sense of illegality, at least.

Mr. HALE. The trouble with the bonds was not—and it was never claimed that it was—that they were fraudulent; but, as in many other cases, they were validated in order to avoid mere technicalities. It never was contended that the bonds were fraudulently issued.

Mr. BATE. May I say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. RAWLINS. In one moment I will be glad to yield.

The point I desire to make is, that the county of Pima, Ariz., issued these bonds without any lawful authority to do so, and the bonds were void upon their face, because the county had no authority to issue bonds for any other purpose than a county or a public purpose. To issue bonds for the construction of a railroad was beyond the powers of the county; and therefore the bonds were void. Upon the original consideration and under the law as it existed at the time they were issued, there was no liability against this county or against the Territory of Arizona, either legally, equitably, or morally.

Now, the next step in the matter seems to have been this: Somebody interested in obtaining the validation of these bonds went to the Territorial legislature of Arizona when it was in session, and through the influence of bondholders and the then Territorial governor of Arizona an application was made formally through the legislature to Congress to validate these bonds. Upon what representation did the Territorial legislature take this action? This matter has been before Congress heretofore, when the question was up whether these bonds should be validated by Congressional action. The inducement, as I am informed—and the information I have upon the subject I believe is correct—was that the people who held the bonds would not only construct this railroad but would extend it in such a manner that it would be of public advantage to the Territory of Arizona. Upon the faith of this representation by the men who held these bonds the Territorial legislature made application to Congress to ratify the bonds, the new consideration being a promise which I am informed never has been fulfilled.

But one other point in connection with this matter which throws some light upon it, to my mind, is that the brother of the then Territorial governor, a Federal appointee, was the party who made the promise for the construction or extension of this railroad to the public advantage of the Territory, and the governor, a Federal appointee, used his influence to induce the members of the legislature to make this application to Congress. An application was made, and Congress validated these bonds.

Mr. HALE. The Senator means that the governor of the Territory coerced the legislature of the Territory into making this application.

Mr. RAWLINS. I did not so state.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator deny that the legislative authority of the Territory, as it then existed, representing the whole Territory, invoked the intercession of Congress to validate these bonds?

Mr. RAWLINS. What I said, and I do not think it can require any explanation, is that the bondholders obtained the good offices of the brother of the governor and the influence of the governor himself to induce the legislature of Arizona to apply to Congress for the validation of these bonds.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator mean to say that the constituent element that makes up legislatures in Arizona makes them up in such a fashion that the brother of a governor coerced them into that act?

Mr. RAWLINS. I did not say——

Mr. HALE. Because if that is the situation and the condition of Arizona, the larger responsibilities that the legislature has imposed on it the worse it is for the Territory. I should not want to be responsible for the statement that the brother of the governor induced the legislature to go into this proposition. That is a reflection not so much upon the brother of the governor or the governor as it is on the legislature itself.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine will permit me, I have not said that the governor or the brother of the governor coerced the legislature of Arizona. I imply nothing more than what would occur if I should say the President or the brother of the President used influence upon the Republican side of the Senate to obtain action which was approved by the President. The members of the legislature in Arizona are elected by the people, and the proposition which I stated and the information which I have had upon the subject is that the members of the legislature were induced to make the application to Congress for the validation of these bonds upon the promise that the bondholders and those who were representing them would cause the extension and construction of this railroad which they originally undertook to construct and for which construction these bonds were originally issued.

I am informed that that promise, upon which this representation was made by the legislature to Congress, has not been fulfilled, but Congress took the action, the bonds became valid, and have been so declared by the Supreme Court of the United States. Then these bonds are a part of the debts and liabilities of the Territory of Arizona. They stand precisely upon the same footing as any other debt or obligation of the Territory of Arizona. This bill expressly covers that case in the clause which provides:

> Said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of the said State: * * *
> Third. That the debts and liabilities of said Territory of Arizona shall be assumed and paid by said State.

Mr. President, nothing can be more explicit than that. The people of Arizona, represented in convention, are to solemnly pledge themselves by ordinance, irrevocable in form, to recognize and provide for the payment of these bonds. There is no information here furnished by any Senator that the State does not intend to fulfill this obligation.

Mr. QUARLES. If the Senator will permit me, right at this point I should like to have the opinion of the distinguished Senator regarding that legislature which thus saddled upon the people of the whole Territory a fraudulent issue of bonds, and as to the propriety of conferring upon it unlimited power as to the creation of indebtedness, as he would do by statehood?

Mr. RAWLINS. When the Senator asks me my opinion as to the propriety of this action, I might turn and ask the Senator as to the propriety of our action in Congress. Full, sovereign legislative authority over this Territory is vested in Congress. Congress legislates in respect to the Territories, upon the information it possesses, as an original authority, and is supposed to make inquiries as to the merits or demerits of any proposition which may be presented to it for consideration. If the action of the Territorial legislature in ratifying these bonds is a reflection upon the personnel of that legislature, it is equally a reflection upon the personnel of the Congress of the United States. The members of this legislature, as the representatives of the people of the Territory, have at least shown the same degree of fitness to deal with public questions, with public obligations, as did, in this instance, the Congress of the United States.

I should like to know why the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Wisconsin rise here and impute dishonesty or incapacity to the members of the Territorial legislature for doing the very thing which they themselves have voted to do as members of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HALE. The Congress did what it frequently does. Upon the solicitation of the authorities of the Territory——

Mr. BERRY. On the solicitation of the bondholders.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. Congress was not in possession of the entire facts. Congress had to depend upon somebody for a true statement of the situation in passing an act that would authorize not the validating of fraudulently issued bonds, but the validating of bonds which by a technicality had exceeded the authority of the county that issued them.

Now, that happens every day. The Senator himself knows of matters from his own State. Legislatures of States and Territories have beset Congress—I may use the word "beset," perhaps, because they are sometimes very importunate—and the conditions and the facts are taken from the legal representatives of the Territories who come here. We have to act upon information. We find afterwards—I did not know it until it was stated here—that Congress acted upon the legislative movement of the Territory that was induced, and persuaded, and perhaps coerced by a brother of the governor. If that is the way, I repeat, that the legislature were influenced in Arizona, they are not particularly competent to exercise the functions of a legislature of a State in the Union.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I did not bring it out. The other side brought it out. I never heard of this before.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Utah will allow me, I should like to make a suggestion there. It illustrates just what these people in the Territories want to escape from—the kind of government to which they are subjected. They did not choose their governor. He was sent to them by the President of the United States.

Mr. HALE. But they chose the legislature.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that it is the legislature.

Mr. FORAKER. They chose the local legislature, and I have a memorial here——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And they chose their Delegate.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. I will yield in a moment. I am very glad to hear the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, who in the course of the whole debate has been extremely fair and, I may say, large in his consideration, that an added reason why we should admit Arizona is that her people want to escape from their legislature.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I will take only a moment. The Senator from Maine made reference to the governor of the Territory.

Mr. HALE. And the legislature.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator was speaking particularly of the governor, as I understood it. I reminded him in that connection——

Mr. HALE. I was speaking of the legislature.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I will tell him what I understood and what I said. Then he can take the floor again. I do not want to unduly trespass on the time of the Senator from Utah.

I was making my suggestion in answer to the Senator's, which I understood to be that the governor had exercised an improper influence in the matter. Now, here is what the legislature of Arizona did in regard to this matter, if the Senator from Utah will allow me to put it in evidence.

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. However, before I do that I want simply to recapitulate that these bonds were issued for the purpose of aiding a railroad. The payment of them was resisted on the ground that they were unlawfully issued and no railroad was ever built. The people of Arizona and the people of Pima County, as I am told, never got one dollar of value in return. The courts held that being illegally issued there was no liability. The Supreme Court of the United States so held; and it was after that that somebody induced Congress to pass a law validating invalid bonds. That is what was done.

Now, do you tell me that the bondholders had nothing to do with it? If so, who did have to do with it? The bondholders had a motive in coming to Congress to secure that kind of legislation. There was something to result to them of advantage on account of it. If the people of the Territory came to Congress and asked Congress to validate fraudulently issued bonds in order that they might be made liable to pay them, it was certainly a most extraordinary proceeding. I am assured to the contrary by one who lives in Arizona, who has a right to speak for Arizona, who claims to be familiar with the facts, and I have no doubt he is familiar with the facts.

I am told by him that it was, as I said a while ago, the bondholders who came to Congress and importuned the Congress and secured this most extraordinary legislation, for extraordinary it is, Mr. President, unusual to a high degree, for the Congress of the United States to undertake to say to the people of a Territory that a certain county within its limits has fraudulently issued securities for which the people have received no return; securities that purport to have been issued in aid of the construction of a railroad which has never been built, the proceeds of which securities have been pocketed, I am told, by a lot of thieves and scoundrels, and yet say that the people of that struggling Territory shall be compelled to pay them. In God's name, is it any wonder that the people of that Territory are demanding that they be released from such a supervision and such a controlling legislative power? Can anybody wonder——

Mr. LODGE and Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I am not done; wait until I conclude.

Now, Mr. President, that is what Congress did. After Congress had passed that kind of an act, here is the kind of a memorial which was sent to Congress in that connection, and when I read it I think it will be seen that these people show that they are not only qualified to represent a Territory as a legislative body and protect its rights, but that they would do credit to any State in the Union. I can see no lack of ability, no lack of morality, no lack of statesmanship in this document. It is a memorial of the Territorial legislature sent in 1899 to the Congress from the Territorial legislature of Arizona, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives.

It says:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, beg leave to submit to your honorable bodies—

And then they go on to recite numerous facts. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read it all, but here they come to the Pima County narrow-gauge railroad bonds:

Whereas said bonds issued to said Arizona Narrow-Gauge Railroad Company were never acquired by said company in good faith, and were never sold by it in good faith or for a valuable consideration, and none of the interest on said bonds had ever been paid by Pima County, and the validity of said bonds had never been acknowledged by said county; and

Whereas the said Arizona Narrow-Gauge Railroad was never built and never existed, and Pima County has never received any consideration whatever for the said so-called bonds, and the entire scheme of the said bond issue was a fraud without any element of merit or good faith; and

Whereas all the foregoing facts were and are notorious, and within the knowledge of everyone who has ever had any dealings with said bonds, etc.

There, Mr. President, I have read enough to show the ground upon which this liability was resisted. Yet Senators come in here and in the name of assumed good morals tell us that these people are repudiators, not fit to come into the Union of States and have representation here alongside of the States they represent.

Mr. HALE. What were the memorialists in this case asking?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask the Senator from Ohio what he has been reading from?

Mr. FORAKER. I am reading from Senate Document No. 117, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.

Mr. QUARLES. What is the prayer of the memorialists? What is it they ask?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is it a memorial of the legislature or is it a remonstrance against that memorial?

Mr. HALE. That is what I want the Senator to tell.

Mr. FORAKER. I am trying to call your attention to the facts. The Senator has told us why there was an appeal made by the Territorial legislature——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator himself perhaps in his ardor gave rise to terms, and stated that the people of the Territory of Arizona wanted to escape from their legislature, to use his language. Now, no one on this side advanced that proposition or suggested that thought. I do not suppose the Senator is reading from the memorial of the legislature, because the Senator from Connecticut has the papers here, and the legislature——

Mr. FORAKER. I will read all of it in order that I may satisfy the Senator from Maine, if it is necessary. I was speaking at the expense of the time of the Senator from Utah, and therefore I was reading only what I conceived to be the salient points. I was answering as to the fact which was understood in Arizona, and which led to their resistance to the payment of these bonds.

Mr. HALE. The Senator prefaced by stating that he proposed to read from what he thought was a statesmanlike document of the legislature——

Mr. FORAKER. So I did.

Mr. HALE. And that he would prove that the legislature was statesmanlike in its attitude. Now, we have that memorial. Perhaps it is what the Senator has. If he has, he can readily state what it is. Is the Senator reading from the memorial of the legislature?

Mr. FORAKER. I am reading from a memorial that is signed Morris Goldwater, president of the council; Henry F. Ashurst, speaker of the house.

I hereby certify the within to be a true copy of house memorial No. 1.
W. D. BERRY, Chief Clerk.

Filed in the office of the secretary of the Territory of Arizona this 7th day of February, A. D. 1899, at 3.30 p. m.
CHARLES H. AKERS,
Secretary of Arizona.

Mr. HALE. Now we shall have the whole document from the legislature read.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to answer what the Senator has just said. I started out to show what the facts were leading to the resistance by the people of Arizona to the payment of these bonds. I undertook to show that these were bonds that were illegally issued, and in that behalf I cited the decision of the court, and the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in 155 United States, in the case cited by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. In 172 United States there is a citation of that case.

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me just a moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. Before the Senator from Ohio passes from that document, which was to establish the statesmanship of that local legislature, will not the Senator oblige the Senate by reading not the mere statement of facts, but the prayer of the memorial?

Mr. FORAKER. Why, certainly; I will read the whole of it——

Mr. QUARLES. In order that we may know what the legislature were desirous of doing.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no objection to reading the whole of it. I was reading enough for the purpose that I was seeking to subserve, namely, to controvert the proposition of the other side that these bonds had been issued, as the Senator from Connecticut said, in payment for a railroad.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. LODGE. It is absolutely correct. I have the statement of the Supreme Court here, which says that there was no evidence of bad faith whatever.

Mr. FORAKER. That is something I have not seen. I am talking about what I have before me, and I have before me this memorial, which states that the road never was built—not one particle of it—and why the payment was resisted.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. By whom?

Mr. FORAKER. Now the Senator from Wisconsin wants me to read the memorial. I will put the whole of it in the RECORD in order that Senators may have the benefit of it. They recite the facts to which I have already called attention. I will send it to the desk to be incorporated in the RECORD. It says:

TERRITORY OF ARIZONA, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Territory of Arizona, ss:

I, Charles H. Akers, secretary of the Territory of Arizona, do hereby certify that the annexed is a true and complete transcript of the memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, praying for legislation to render invalid Pima County (Ariz.) bonds issued to the Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, which was filed in this office the 7th day of February, A. D. 1899, at 3.30 o'clock p. m., as provided by law.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal. Done at the city of Phoenix, the capital, this 7th day of February, A. D. 1899.

[SEAL.] CHARLES H. AKERS,
Secretary of the Territory of Arizona.

MEMORIAL.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, beg leave to submit to your honorable bodies that—

Whereas a memorial was presented to your honorable bodies by the eighteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona regarding bonds issued by certain counties of said Territory, which memorial was intended to apply only to such bonds as had been bought in good faith, and interest on which had been paid, as stated in the aforesaid memorial; and

Whereas, in response to said memorial, your honorable bodies thereafter passed the act entitled "An act amending and extending the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act approving, with amendments, the funding act of Arizona,' approved June 25, 1890, and the act amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, approved August 3, 1894," approved June 6, 1896; and

Whereas, based on said memorial and act of June 6, 1896, the Supreme Court of the United States has recently rendered a decision tending to recognize the validity of certain bonds issued by Pima County, Arizona Territory, to the Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad under the provisions of the act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona approved February 1, 1883; and

Whereas, before the passage of said memorial said bonds had been declared unauthorized and void by the district court of the first judicial district of the Territory of Arizona in and for Pima County, by the supreme court of the Territory of Arizona, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Lewis v. The County of Pima, decided in the Supreme Court of the United States at its October, 1894, term; and

Whereas said bonds issued to said Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad Company were never acquired by said company in good faith, and were never sold by it in good faith or for a valuable consideration, and none of the interest on said bonds had ever been paid by Pima County, and the validity of said bonds had never been acknowledged by said county; and

Whereas the said Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad was never built and never existed, and Pima County has never received any consideration whatever for the said so-called bonds, and the entire scheme of the said bond issue was a fraud without any element of merit or good faith; and

Whereas all the foregoing facts were and are notorious, and within the knowledge of everyone who has ever had any dealings with said bonds; and

Whereas it was by all the members of the legislature passing said memorial, and by the governor of Arizona at the time, and by the then Delegate in Congress from Arizona believed that all of said bonds so issued by Pima County to the Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad Company were res adjudicata by the said decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that none of the said bonds could be thereafter validated, and—

That is natural. That certainly is statesmanlike. When the Supreme Court of the United States had held that the bonds were absolutely invalid because illegally issued, without any consideration, and the proceeds, in so far as there were any, had been stolen and misappropriated, they might very naturally think that it was not in the power of Congress or any other legislative body to validate such an obligation. But they were not then aware of the great and unrestricted power of this legislative body. Now they go on:

Whereas said memorial was intended to apply only to certain railway aid bonds of two other counties in Arizona, where the aided railways were actually constructed, and not to the said bonds so issued by Pima County, as to which none of the statements or reasons in said memorial applied, and which bonds were then, as now, believed to be without consideration, unjust, fraudulent, and void:

Therefore we most strongly urge upon the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America to pass such legislation as will exclude from the provisions of the act of Congress of June 6, 1896, and from any and all other legislation by Congress, the said bonds so issued by Pima County to the Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, so that neither said act of June 6, 1896, or any other act will be construed so as to validate the said bonds issued by Pima County. And it is further

Resolved, That our Delegate to Congress be, and is hereby, instructed to use all proper means to bring this subject to the careful and immediate consideration of Congress, in order to secure, if possible, from Congress such legislation as is prayed for herein; and that the secretary of the Territory be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing memorial to each House of Congress and to our Delegate in Congress.

MORRIS GOLDWATER,
President of the Council.
HENRY F. ASHURST,
Speaker of the House.

I hereby certify the within to be a true copy of house memorial No. 1.
W. D. BERRY, Chief Clerk.

Filed in the office of the secretary of the Territory of Arizona this 7th day of February, A. D. 1899, at 3.30 p. m.

CHARLES H. AKERS,
Secretary of Arizona.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat that this is a memorial from the Territorial legislature of Arizona, addressed to the Congress of the United States. It is a memorial in which they profess to recite the facts. I am not familiar with them; I know them only as they are revealed by the Supreme Court Reports, which I have had time only to hastily scan, and what I have gathered from this memorial, and what has been told me here on the floor of the Chamber within the last hour. But from these facts and the information that has been given to me on the subject, the case is simply this: That as to the railroad mentioned for which these bonds of Pima County were issued, the fact is that no road was built.

They were fraudulently issued, and the Supreme Court of the United States, along with all the other courts that passed upon it, have so held. And the Supreme Court of the United States having so held, then the representatives of somebody came here. The Senator from Maine says it was the people of the Territory of Arizona and not the bondholders. If so, all the more credit to the people of Arizona, but it seems to me unreasonable. This disputes that fact. Somebody did come here, however, and induced Congress to pass an act saddling on the Territorial government a debt that had been unlawfully contracted. What wonder that the people of the Territory should refuse to pay until the court said that Congress could validly exercise that very arbitrary and tyrannical and oppressive power? I do not hesitate to say it.

There was, Mr. President, no debt here owed by anybody. The Supreme Court of the United States said so in the case reported in 155 U. S.

Mr. LODGE. Never.

Mr. FORAKER. They never said so? Let us see if they never said so.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FORAKER. I will for a question, but I do not yield to the Senator from Maine for a speech just now.

Mr. HALE. I can ask a question on that. I think I am capable of doing that. Is this the memorial which the Senator from Utah says the legislature was induced to send by the brother of the governor?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. That is a question.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the question the Senator asks?

Mr. HALE. Is this the memorial which the Senator from Utah says the legislature of Arizona was induced unwillingly to send by the machinations and intrigues of the brother of the governor?

Mr. FORAKER. I heard no such statement. I was not in the Chamber while the Senator was speaking.

Mr. HALE. That is the only reason——

Mr. FORAKER. If he made such a statement, he made it in my absence. I know nothing about what induced the legislature beyond the facts recited. They certainly were sufficient.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator from Utah stated——

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Utah can answer the question.

Mr. HALE. He says they were induced——

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield that the Senator from Utah may answer the question.

Mr. RAWLINS. Now, Mr. President, if I may be permitted to respond to the question which was addressed to me by the Senator from Maine, in the first place I want to say I did not state that the legislature of Arizona had been coerced by anybody.

Mr. HALE. Induced.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I will conclude in a minute.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought while the Senator was looking for the cases, I would ask a question or two, but of course I do not want to intrude on his time.

Mr. RAWLINS. I will be glad to respond to the Senator presently, but I want to answer one or two things.

Mr. President, perhaps the Senate ought to know what the legislature of Arizona actually did in the way of importuning Congress for this validating legislation. I have the memorial before me. Before I read it I will make the premise that the governor of Arizona was a Federal appointee and for him the people of the Territory were not responsible. They were not responsible for his relatives. The Territorial legislature had, as a matter of fact, passed various acts authorizing certain counties to issue bonds in aid of the construction of railroads.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. RAWLINS. In one moment.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to get the date straight. Those authorizing acts to the counties were long before the memorial.

Mr. RAWLINS. That is what I was proceeding to state. The authorizing acts of the Territorial legislature were long before the memorial, and in pursuance——

Mr. LODGE. Was there a brother of the governor going then——

Mr. RAWLINS. The various counties undertook to exercise this authority under the acts which the legislature had passed. Pima County issued the bonds in question, which were without consideration and void. Thereupon the legislature of Arizona adopted this memorial to Congress:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, beg leave to submit to your honorable bodies that

Whereas under various acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona certain of the counties of the Territory were authorized to issue in aid of railroads and other quasi public improvements and did under such acts issue bonds, which said bonds were sold in open market, in most instances at their face value, and are now held at home and abroad by persons who, in good faith, invested their money in the same, and, save and except such knowledge as the law imputes to the holder of bonds issued under authorized acts, are holders of the same; and

Whereas the validity of these bonds for many years after their issuance was unquestioned and acknowledged by the payment of the interest thereon as it fell due; and

Whereas there has recently been raised a question as to whether these acts of the legislative assembly were valid under the organic law of the Territory, which had led to movement looking to the repudiation of the indebtedness created under and by virtue of such acts; and

Whereas we believe that such repudiation would, under the circumstances, work great wrong and hardship to the holders of such bonds, and at the same time seriously affect the credit and standing of our people for honesty and fair dealing and bring us into disrepute:

Therefore we most strongly urge upon your most honorable bodies the propriety and justice of passing such curative and remedial legislation as will protect the holders of all bonds issued under the authority of acts of the legislative assembly.

And I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to this language as to what the legislature of the Territory then asked Congress to do:

Therefore we most strongly urge upon your most honorable bodies the propriety and justice of passing such curative and remedial legislation as will protect the holders of all bonds issued under the authority of acts of the legislative assembly, the validity of which has heretofore been acknowledged, and that you further legislate so as to protect all innocent parties having entered into contracts resulting from inducements offered by our Territorial legislation and relieve the people of the Territory from the disastrous effects that must necessarily follow any repudiation of good faith on the part of the Territory, and that you may so further legislate as to validate all acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory which have held out inducements for the investment of capital within the Territory, and which have led to the investment of large sums of money in enterprises directly contributing to the development and growth of the Territory, and thus relieve the honest people of the Territory from the disastrous effects that must necessarily follow any violation of good faith on the part of our people.

Mr. President, what the legislature asked Congress to do was to validate bonds and obligations which had been issued pursuant to Territorial legislation in good faith, for which there had been consideration in the way of public improvements tending to the development of the Territory, and which obligations had been recognized by the payment of interest which had accrued upon the bonds; but that memorial in no degree applied to the Pima County bonds in question, for the reason that they had then been repudiated; that no interest had been paid upon them; and that no consideration was ever parted with by those who held them.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Supreme Court, then, was mistaken?

Mr. LODGE. The Supreme Court stated that interest was paid on them.

Mr. RAWLINS. I mean to say at the time of the memorial——

Mr. LODGE. They say interest has been paid.

Mr. RAWLINS. These Pima County bonds were issued for the construction of a road which was never built. The charge is distinctly made in the memorial read by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that the people who held those bonds did not pay for them any valid consideration. There was nothing done by those to whom the bonds were issued for the development of the Territory; there was no performance or part performance. This memorial grew out of all the circumstances of the situation.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. RAWLINS. The memorial related to the county of Yavapai, which county had, under the authority of the Territorial legislature, issued bonds for a consideration, and the party who received the bonds proceeded in good faith to the construction of the road.

Some question was raised as to the validity of those bonds. It was then claimed by the legislature that if these obligations, which were incurred in good faith, and for which consideration had been given by the holders of the bonds, were repudiated, it would cast discredit upon the people of the Territory. Then it was necessary, under the circumstances, that the legislature take some action to restore that credit. Hence the legislature passed this memorial, the effect of which was to ask Congress to put beyond question the validity of the bonds for which consideration had been given, for which public improvements had been made, and upon which every consideration of equity demanded that the contract on the part of the Territory, or the counties in the Territory, should be fulfilled. But when this memorial came to Congress, thus limited, and not at all applicable to the Pima County bonds, it was Congress which passed the legislation, not solicited by the Territorial legislature, for the validation of those bonds in language broad enough, as it was held by the Supreme Court, to extend to the validation of the Pima County bonds.

But, Mr. President, is there anything in these circumstances which tends in any degree to show the unfitness of the people of the Territory of Arizona for admission into the Union?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. RAWLINS. For a question only.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to know whether or not the Delegate of the Territory asked Congress for this legislation?

Mr. RAWLINS. I know nothing about that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course, it has an important bearing, because if the Delegate elected by the people asked Congress for this validating legislation, that must be referred to the people who elected him. I do not know. I am asking for information.

Mr. RAWLINS. It may be important.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to suggest that the Delegate from a Territory might be mistaken as to his duty or as to the performance of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He might.

Mr. RAWLINS. I am informed, if the Senator from Indiana will permit me to answer his question, that the present Delegate from the Territory has resisted this legislation throughout, as it extended beyond the purpose of the memorial.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask as to the Delegate at that time?

Mr. RAWLINS. I know nothing about that, and so can not answer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Delegate before the present one was a private citizen before he was a Delegate.

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Senator permit me to ask him for the respective dates of these two memorials?

Mr. RAWLINS. I can not state at this instant.

Mr. FORAKER. The memorial I read from—I did not know there was any other when I read it—is dated "February 7, 1899, at 3.30 o'clock p. m." [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. The other was dated 1898—the year before.

Mr. RAWLINS. I do not know that the exact date is necessary, but I find, in compliance with this memorial, that Congress, on the 6th day of June, 1896, passed an act for the validation of these obligations. I think the memorial which I have just read to the Senate was adopted in 1895.

But, Mr. President, it is claimed, and no longer disputed, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court, that these Pima County bonds, by reason of the action of Congress, with which the Territorial legislation had nothing to do, have become a binding obligation upon the people of the Territory. I have already read the bill which is proposed by the Territory, embodying the conditions under which it will come into the Union. If they are admitted under this bill, they propose to pay all debts and obligations of the Territory, which of course would now include the bonds in question. The people of the Territory of Arizona can not do more than that. They make this solemn pledge in the form of an ordinance, irrevocable in character, that they will pay these bonds, originally fraudulent and illegal, validated, not by any act of their own, but solely by the authority of Congress.

They make this concession to fraud and dishonesty; they make this concession to the appeals of Senators here, that unless the bonds, for which no consideration was parted with, illegal in their inception, be paid, the people of this Territory, otherwise fit for admission into the Union, shall be denied that boon.

Because here has been a controverted question whether the Territory should be saddled with the payment of a debt for which they received no consideration, and have seen fit to litigate it in a legtimate and lawful way, it being a debt created by the action of Congress, and not by reason of any demerit in their case, now when they come here and say "We will pay, in order to gain admission, this, with other debts and obligations, solemnly pledging ourselves to do so," it would seem there would be scarcely longer any reason to be imputed to those people why they shall not be admitted into the Union as a State.

Mr. President, this is nothing but an obligation against the Territory. These bondholders can not recover by suit against the Territory any more than they could recover against the State. The condition of the holders of these fraudulent bonds will in no degree be made worse after the admission of the Territory as a State than before admission. This, it seems to me, which has been presented by distinguished Senators as the crowning and conclusive argument upon which the other side rest their case against the admission of the Territory, falls to pieces.

These pioneers out in the remote counties in Arizona, struggling to build up their homes, desiring access to the rest of mankind by the construction of railroads, have doubtless held out inducements to people who in good faith would undertake to render to them such services. They have never raised any question about the validity of any bonds where the railroad had been constructed—where the parties receiving aid have proceeded in good faith to fulfill their part of the obligation.

Certain parties held out inducements to the people of Pima to issue bonds. Thereupon those parties failed utterly to comply with their part of the contract. They ought to be shut out of court, and they would be shut out, as they were shut out under the first decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, but the people of that Territory find interposed between them and their rights an act of Congress validating not only those bonds which they desire to recognize, but illegal and unauthorized bonds. Now, will it be said that so long as there is any question about some claim as to whether it is meritorious or not, fraudulent or legal, between Arizona, or Oklahoma, or New Mexico and some person making some fictitious or even a meritorious claim against them—until every disputed claim in respect of obligations of any one of these Territories is finally settled and the money paid—that no one of them can be admitted as a State? If that were true, no Territory would have been admitted as a State in the past.

These Territories proceeded to make application to come in, not precisely on the same conditions which have been presented and conceded to every other Territory knocking for admission into the Union——

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. DEPEW. A statement and a question. I want to see whether I am correct. I know nothing about this matter except what I learn from the discussion to which we have been listening; but if I understand the documents which were read a moment ago, the memorial read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] and the memorial read by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], together with the legislation which has been referred to, this is the historical condition: The council or legislative assembly of Arizona, in the memorial which the Senator from Utah has read, petitioned Congress to pass these validating acts. The memorial is very strong as to the reasons why, namely, that on account of certain repudiation the credit of the Territory of Arizona was seriously affected, as was also that of various counties in the Territory. After acting upon that memorial, Congress passed a validating act. Then came the litigation in court; then the court sustained the bonds; and then came the second memorial, asking Congress to repudiate the bonds which the court had validated under the act of Congress. Is that correct?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the chronology of the Senator is not correct. These particular bonds were issued without authority, without consideration; but other bonds were issued for which there was consideration, which had been recognized by the Territory and by counties in the Territory. The legislature memorialized Congress to validate those bonds for which consideration had been received. Congress validated all bonds, including those for which no consideration had been given. The legislature then memorialized that Congress had not complied with their request, but had gone beyond it and undertaken to validate bonds for which no consideration had been given, which were illegal and fraudulent, namely, these Pima County bonds, and asking Congress to modify and correct the action which it had originally taken.

In the meantime the bondholders had taken into court the bonds originally invalid, and which became valid by reason of the action of Congress. Ultimately the Supreme Court of the United States, very recently, has held that those bonds were valid because Congress had validated them. So the Senator from New York will perceive that the situation is that the Territorial legislature memorialized Congress to render its aid in order that equitable and just debts might not be repudiated. Congress went beyond that request and validated bonds for which there was no legal liability and no equitable liability on the part of the Territory or of any county in it. Congress failed to correct its former action in this regard, and now Senators say that by reason of the fact that the legislature had been induced to memorialize Congress, requesting Congress to take this action, the people of the Territory have shown their unfitness for statehood.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said that Senators and Members of the House of Representatives are compelled to rely upon the information which they receive from the local legislature and from the Delegate representing the Territory. Mr. President, that in a measure is true, but we find when we look to the information that was communicated to Congress by the Territorial legislature that that communication did not ask for the validation of the Pima County bonds, nor did they come within the general description of the obligations which it was sought by the Territory to have approved by Congress. Hence Congress was not induced by any representation of the Territorial legislature to validate the Pima County bonds.

Who were interested especially in having those bonds validated? Unquestionably the bondholders. Who represents the bondholders? No citizen of Arizona, but, as we are informed, a distinguished citizen of the State of New York. No one has any objection to his representing his clients and insisting upon the performance of any legal obligation which may have been incurred by the people of Arizona; but we are assured by the public press that he has come here to Washington, has interviewed the President of the United States, and has made a declaration somewhat similar to that of Germany to Venezuela: "We will blockade your ports; we will shut you out from the Union; we will deny to you the political privilege to which you are otherwise entitled until you go down into your pockets and pay these obligations"—obligations originally fraudulent, for which the men who hold them, for whose benefit they have been incurred, made no payment and parted with no consideration. "You must pay these bonds or our potent influence"—the potent influence of the bondholders and their representatives in New York—"will see to it that no right is accorded to the pioneers away out in the Territory of Arizona."

I think the intention of Congress has been rather directed to the importunities of the representatives of the bondholders from the State of New York than to the representatives of the people of Arizona coming here to ask, not that fraudulent claims be recognized, but that equitable and just obligations be not repudiated.

We have discovered now, it seems, precisely the objection and the ground upon which all business in the Senate is to be arrested. We have discovered the ground now by reason of which we are to have a filibuster to prevent a vote upon the question of the admission of any one of those Territories into the Union. At last it has come to light, through the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], that the fundamental and constitutional and moral objection, overwhelming in character, to the passage of this bill is that the holders of some one hundred thousand dollars' worth of fraudulently issued bonds must have their money upon their fraudulent, illegal paper, validated only by the unjust action of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think, under the circumstances, that the Territory of Arizona would have a right to repudiate those bonds?

Mr. RAWLINS. I have already answered that the Supreme Court have held that these bonds, illegal in their inception, for which the holders parted with no consideration, are valid and binding debts and obligations of the Territory; but under the act which the Territory presents to us, embodying the conditions upon which she asks admission, she declares that she will by ordinance, irrevocable in form, undertake the payment of all debts and obligations of the Territory, including these bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. But does the Senator think the Territory is morally or equitably bound to pay those bonds?

Mr. RAWLINS. I certainly think that the Territory, if I am correctly informed as to the facts, is not equitably, is not morally, but is legally bound to do so, because the Supreme Court of the United States has so declared by reason of the action of Congress, which was authorized, having full power to legislate in all respects whatsoever as to a Territory. We have the power to declare, and without their consent, that the people of Pima County or the people of the Territory of Arizona should pay $100,000 or $100,000,000 for which they had received nothing. We have done it, and that is the end of it. That is the end of the controversy. We have the power, the mere power, not founded in equity or justice, but the absolute, uncontrolled power, because the plenitude of our powers in respect to a Territory is no longer questioned. We have the power to say, and we did say, to the people of Arizona: "Pay this $100,000 to the men who procured this paper, worthless in its inception, for which they made no payment whatsoever, for which they parted with no consideration whatsoever." It is not an equitable, it is not a moral, but it is a legal obligation; and the people of the Territory, recognizing that it is legal and that they can not escape it, bow to our edict, founded in injustice, and say: "We will pay this, too; but clothe us with the habiliments of statehood and enable us to have a voice in the legislative council of the nation, in order that no further iniquity of this kind and wrong shall be perpetrated upon us."

Mr. President, this is an argument which ought to be conclusive to reasonable minds why these Territories ought to be admitted. There is a case where the Supreme Court originally held that these bonds were void, worthless. After that decision Congress says that they are valid and binding obligations upon the people of the Territory; and the Supreme Court says: "The sovereign, uncontrolled power, Congress, has acted, and its edict must be obeyed. You helpless people of the Territory must now pay this debt for which you received no consideration." That is the pitiable condition of the people, the pioneers, who are held in subserviency in the Territories, and it is of that character of people out of which this great Government has been constructed and built up and out of which have come all the glories she possesses. The same kind of people have gone out into Arizona and sought to build up the waste places upon the continent. Why should they not have a voice, a potent voice, in the halls of Congress to protest against such iniquity?

Mr. President, it seems to me that the conclusive argument in this case has been furnished why Arizona and New Mexico and Oklahoma should be admitted into the Union as States.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. FORAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is recognized.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I ask whether or not I had the floor. I was on the floor when the Senator from Utah——

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] yielded the floor to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

Mr. FORAKER. No; I did not yield the floor. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] asked me a question as to whether or not I agreed with the Senator from Utah. I replied that I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Utah made any such statement as that imputed to him, but I would yield to the Senator from Utah, who asked that I might do so in order that he might answer the question of the Senator from Maine. He has been ever since answering it. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to take the floor from anyone. I had waited very patiently, I thought, until everyone had spoken and I was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. FORAKER. I was in the midst of some remarks that I desire very much to conclude. It perhaps is not material, but I think the Senator from Massachusetts should not insist, even if he has the right to deprive me of the floor——

Mr. LODGE. I will not insist, of course.

Mr. FORAKER. Until I may conclude what I was about to say.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I am glad——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. I yield, of course, Mr. President.

Mr. FORAKER. I am glad that I have had this interruption, Mr. President, because it has given me an opportunity to look over the cases that have been reported as decided by the Supreme Court, and to look over these two memorials. I think now I can make an intelligent explanation of the whole matter, and state it so that anybody can understand it, and so that there will not be any reproach resting upon the people of Arizona.

I never heard of this question about the Pima County bonds until the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] took the floor and raised the question whether or not the Territory of Arizona had not been guilty of repudiation, or an attempted repudiation; but as he progressed, and as others spoke, I began to find out about it. I sent for the authorities cited, and now I think I can give an intelligent explanation of the whole matter.

It seems, Mr. President, that under Territorial legislation bonds were issued to aid in the construction of railroads; not one railroad, but a number of railroads. In a number of cases these bonds were regularly and lawfully issued, and from time to time, as the interest accrued upon them, the interest was paid. The liability of the Territory was never questioned in any instance as to all such issues, until some years had elapsed. After some years had elapsed, on some account or other, a question did arise as to whether or not there was a liability.

The legislature of Arizona then came forward with the memorial which the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Connecticut evidently had before them when they were asking me to read different parts of the memorial I had before me. What they were asking me to read had no reference whatever to the point I was trying to make; and for that reason I had not read that part of the memorial. I observed when I read, in answer to their request, the part of the memorial they wanted me to read, it did not fit what they had in their minds. The trouble was owing to the fact that there have been two memorials. I did not know of the first one, and they apparently did not know of the second one. They had the first before them, and I had only the second.

The legislature of Arizona, in a very statesmanlike way, I will say—although the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is absent from the Chamber and we can not, therefore, have his appreciation of the remark until he reads it in the RECORD—came forward and presented a memorial to the Congress of the United States, in which they recite the facts, and I want to give you those facts, in respect to the bonds concerning which they were presenting a memorial. They say:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, beg leave to submit to your honorable bodies that—

Whereas under various acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona certain of the counties of the Territory were authorized to issue, in aid of railroads and other quasi public improvements and did under such acts issue bonds, which said bonds were sold in open market, in most instances at their face value, and are now held at home and abroad by persons who, in good faith, invested their money in the same, and, save and except such knowledge as the law imputes to the holder of bonds issued under authorized acts, are holders of the same; and

Whereas the validity of these bonds for many years after their issuance was unquestioned and acknowledged by the payment of the interest thereon as it fell due; and

Whereas there has recently been raised a question as to whether these acts of the legislative assembly were valid under the organic law of the Territory, which had led to movement looking to the repudiation of the indebtedness created under and by virtue of such acts; and

Whereas we believe that such repudiation would, under the circumstances, work great wrong and hardship to the holders of such bonds and at the same time seriously affect the credit and standing of our people for honesty and fair dealing and bring us into disrepute.

Let me stop here to remark that this does not read like the language of dishonest men seeking to repudiate obligations justly and legally and validly incurred.

Therefore we most strongly urge upon your most honorable bodies the propriety and justice of passing such curative and remedial legislation as will protect the holders of all bonds issued under the authority of acts of the legislative assembly, the validity of which has heretofore been acknowledged, and that you further legislate as to protect all innocent parties having entered into contracts resulting from inducements offered by our Territorial legislation, and relieve the people of the Territory from the disastrous effects that must necessarily follow any repudiation of good faith on the part of the Territory, and that you may so further legislate as to validate all acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory which have held out inducements for the investment of capital within the Territory, and which have led to the investment of large sums of money in enterprises directly contributing to the development and growth of the Territory, and thus relieve the honest people of the Territory from disastrous effects that must necessarily follow any violation of good faith on the part of our people.

Resolved, That our Delegate be, and he is hereby, instructed to use all honorable means to bring this subject to the earnest consideration of Congress; that the secretary of the Territory be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing to each House of Congress and to our Delegate in Congress.

The date of the memorial is not given. The print of it, as I have read it, is found in 172 United States Reports.

Mr. LODGE. It was adopted in 1895.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to remark that I am informed it was adopted in 1895 and presented in 1895.

Mr. LODGE. It is so stated in the Supreme Court report.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well. That is near enough. At any rate, that memorial followed immediately after the case reported in the 155 United States Reports, at page 54, the case of Lewis v. Pima County, cited first in this debate by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. Let me read the syllabus in that case:

The act of the legislature of Arizona of February 21, 1883, authorizing Pima County, in that Territory, to issue its bonds in aid of the construction of a railway, is a violation of the restrictions imposed upon the Territorial legislatures by Revised Statutes, section 1889, as amended by the act of June 8, 1878, chapter 168, and the bonds issued under the authority assumed to be conferred by that statute created no obligation against the county which a court of law can enforce.

The court set out in their opinion and in the statement of facts in the case what the facts were, namely, that the bonds were issued without any lawful authority; that they created no liability whatever on the county of Pima; that nobody was under any obligations to pay them, and that the holders of them were without any remedy at all at law, whatever their remedy might be elsewhere.

As a result of that decision of the Supreme Court, there was a cloud cast upon all the bonds they had issued, and then followed the memorial of the legislature which I have just read.

But, Mr. President, the memorial describes one class of bonds and the Supreme Court describes another class of bonds when it comes to the Pima County bonds. The memorial speaks of bonds lawfully and regularly issued, duly sold, most of them for par, the proceeds of which passed into the hands of the officials of the counties and were used in the construction of railroads. Therefore they say it would be repudiation without excuse to refuse to pay bonds of that character. But the Supreme Court said, as to the other bonds, there was no liability whatever of that character, and yet the language employed by the Supreme Court was of such broad character as to cast a cloud on the validity of all the bonds that had been issued.

Then it was that the Congress of the United States, responding to that memorial, passed an act validating the bonds in Arizona in aid of railroad companies, an act of such broad character and language as to include by its terms the Pima County bonds which had been held to be absolutely invalid, which the legislature of Arizona had never asked Congress to validate, and which any lawyer in the country, I think, would have told you nobody would think of asking Congress to validate, making an absolute liability upon the Territory, which had not issued the bonds, on account of bonds unlawfully issued, and issued without consideration by a county of the Territory. Yet that is what was done by the Congress of the United States.

I characterized it fittingly, I think, when I said a while ago that for the Congress of the United States to saddle upon that Territory a liability for which not even the county that had issued the bonds had ever received one dollar of value, was an act of tyranny, and that I do not wonder that the people in the Territory are seeking to escape from such government as the Congress of the United States has been giving to them. It is absolutely inexcusable, and a shame and a disgrace to this body, if these facts are true, that we should have done it. Yet Senators stand here and talk about the incompetency of men in the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona. Mr. President, if there is fault to be found anywhere, it is here, where we would do a thing so absolutely without excuse, as I conceive that to be, looking at the morals of it and looking at the equities of it.

I am not speaking of the question of power. Of course we have the power. The Congress can govern the Territories as the Congress may see fit, and if the Congress sees fit to saddle a debt of over a hundred thousand dollars on a Territory, Congress has power to do it, whether or not the Territory got value received for it, but Congress might be in better business than doing that.

Now, Mr. President, after that decision in 155 United States, then, although the Supreme Court had decided that there was no validity in these bonds, and consequently no obligation or liability on account of them, an obligation was asserted. They undertook to make the people pay on the ground that the statute of Congress which they had asked for as to the other bonds was in such broad terms as to include these bonds as well as the other class of bonds.

Thereupon came the second memorial; and now, as I read it, you will note how it fits in with what I have been saying, how the same legislature which asked that Congress would validate bonds that had been properly issued also asked that Congress would exclude, by proper act of legislation, from the operation of their previous act bonds for which the Territory had never received any value and which were unlawfully issued and the proceeds of which had been pocketed by a lot of scamps. Here is what it says; I want to read all of it:

Territory of Arizona, office of the secretary—

Then follows the certificate by the secretary of the Territory that this memorial has been duly passed by the Territorial legislature. Then it says:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, beg leave to submit to your honorable bodies that

Whereas a memorial was presented to your honorable bodies by the eighteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona regarding bonds issued by certain counties of said Territory, which memorial was intended to apply only to such bonds as had been bought in good faith, and interest on which had been paid, as stated in the aforesaid memorial; and

That is what the legislature of Arizona is now reciting. They are describing the memorial they presented to Congress, a memorial to Congress praying that Congress would validate bonds which had been issued in good faith, in accordance with law, and which had been sold in the market for full value, and the proceeds of which had been used by the officials of Arizona.

Whereas, in response to said memorial, your honorable bodies thereafter passed the act entitled "An act amending and extending the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act approving, with amendments, the funding act of Arizona,' approved June 25, 1890, and the act amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto approved August 3, 1894," approved June 6, 1896; and

Whereas, based on said memorial and act of June 6, 1896, the Supreme Court of the United States has recently rendered a decision tending to recognize the validity of certain bonds issued by Pima County, Arizona Territory, to the Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad under the provisions of the act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona approved February 1, 1883; and

Let me stop here to explain what was meant. After this first memorial and after the legislation that followed, the holders of these Pima County bonds came into the court and insisted that they were validated by this act which the memorial asked for, when the memorialists only asked for such legislation as to bonds that had been properly issued and for which there was a proper consideration. The Supreme Court held that the law was broad enough to apply to all bonds issued, without regard to whether there had been value received or not, but the language employed by the court—I refer to the case of Utter v. Franklin, 172 U. S. Reports, at page 416—was not such as, without question, to make the Pima County bonds valid. Thereupon they memorialized Congress again. Having recited all that, they then proceed:

Whereas before the passage of said memorial said bonds had been declared unauthorized and void by the district court of the first judicial district of the Territory of Arizona in and for Pima County, by the supreme court of the Territory of Arizona, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Lewis v. The County of Pima, decided in the Supreme Court of the United States at its October, 1894, term; and

They recite there the record. These bonds of Pima County had been decided to be invalid before their memorial, by their county court, by the supreme court of the Territory, and by the Supreme Court of the United States. They had been declared invalid and as creating no obligation on Pima county, because there was never any railroad built and never any value received—the whole thing a stupendous fraud from beginning to end. Again they recite:

Whereas said bonds issued to said Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad Company were never acquired by said company in good faith, and were never sold by it in good faith or for a valuable consideration, and none of the interest on said bonds had ever been paid by Pima County, and the validity of said bonds had never been acknowledged by said county; and

Whereas the said Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad was never built and never existed, and Pima County has never received any consideration whatever for the said so-called bonds, and the entire scheme of the said bond issue was a fraud without any element of merit or good faith; and

Whereas all the foregoing facts were and are notorious, and within the knowledge of everyone who has ever had any dealings with said bonds; and

Whereas it was by all the members of the legislature passing said memorial, and by the governor of Arizona at the time, and by the then Delegate in Congress from Arizona believed that all of said bonds so issued by Pima County to the Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad Company were res adjudicata by the said decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that none of the said bonds could be thereafter validated; and

Whereas said memorial was intended to apply only to certain railway aid bonds of two other counties in Arizona, where the aided railways were actually constructed, and not to the said bonds so issued by Pima County, as to which none of the statements or reasons in said memorial applied, and which bonds were then, as now, believed to be without consideration, unjust, fraudulent, and void:

Therefore we most strongly urge upon the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America to pass such legislation as will exclude from the provisions of the act of Congress of June 6, 1896, and from any and all other legislation by Congress, the said bonds so issued by Pima County to the Arizona Narrow Gauge Railroad Company, so that neither said act of June 6, 1896, or any other act will be construed so as to validate the said bonds issued by Pima County.

Congress ought to have responded to that appeal, but Congress did not do so. Congress before that, on the previous memorial, had passed an act broad enough, according to the judgment of the Supreme Court, by its terms to validate bonds that had been issued unlawfully, without any consideration, with the proceeds of which no railroad, and no foot of any railroad, as I understand the facts, had been built. When this appeal was made to the Congress, a case was presented to us to which I say we ought to have responded, for it was made to appear to us that we had passed an act going by its terms far beyond that which had been prayed for by our memorialists, whose prayer we had responded to previously. We ought to have corrected the mistake we made, but we did not do it.

Now, what is the consequence? The Supreme Court says in this case (in 172 U. S.) that the Congress has the power to saddle onto the Territory anything of this nature it may see fit to saddle, and that having done so the court can only say where there was no obligation before one has now been created by the Congress of the United States, and you are helpless by reason of the action of the Congress of the United States and you shall pay.

That being the case, Mr. President, the question of obligation resting upon that idea, is it any wonder that this obligation was contested again in the courts? Would any public official have been true to his trust if he had not, before seeking to enforce payment by using his official power, gone to the courts to test whether or not the Congress of the United States could lawfully impose an obligation where the Supreme Court had already said there was absolutely no obligation?

Now, that is all the delay there has been. They have gone through the courts contesting as to that proposition. The Supreme Court of the United States has now held that the Pima County bonds were validated by the act of Congress. I do not know what the decision is the Senators have before them, which they say was only recently rendered. They have it in their keeping, and I have not been able to see it. But I speak of what the court has said in the former cases, which I do have before me. Would the Senator from Connecticut or Massachusetts have any objection to reading me the syllabus? [A pause.] Very well; I shall wait until the Senator takes the floor. On page 423, of 172 United States, the Supreme Court, in discussing the effect of this act, says:

We think it was within the power of Congress to validate these bonds. Their only defect was that they had been issued in excess of the powers conferred upon the municipalities by the act of June 8, 1878.

I need not read further. The holding of the court was not because of what any official of Pima had done there was a liability, but that a liability had been created by a subsequent act of Congress, an act that we did not pass until the Supreme Court of the United States had held that the bonds had been unlawfully issued and that they were invalid and that they created no obligation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have been greatly interested in his statement about a matter which is entirely new to me. He speaks, I think in proper terms, of the outrageous treatment which these people have received from Congress, if his statement is true. Will the Senator tell me upon whose suggestion or initiative this wonderful legislation was adopted here?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know. This legislation was enacted shortly after I came into the Senate, when I knew a great deal less about what was being done in the Senate than I think I do now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not know but that the Senator had the record there——

Mr. FORAKER. I have not the record here.

Mr. ALDRICH. Showing by what committee of Congress it was reported.

Mr. FORAKER. It was passed by the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose it was adopted upon the report of some committee. I did not know but that the Senator had the record before him.

Mr. FORAKER. These cases do not say anything about that. I have been reading from the Supreme Court Reports. I do not know what committee reported it. All I know is that the Supreme Court states that an act was passed by Congress, and it says, notwithstanding it has held these bonds invalid, this act of Congress, the Congress being all powerful, imposes an obligation where none previously existed.

Mr. ALDRICH. These questions have usually been settled by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, a number of whom have taken part in this debate; and I should like to know who is responsible for the legislation which the Senator is characterizing in such vigorous terms.

Mr. FORAKER. I am addressing the Senate. I have not now time to investigate. As soon as I quit the floor, I will be glad to send for the report and find out all I can about it. I suggest to the Senator that he do so while I am speaking, and thus save time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will do it.

Mr. FORAKER. I have said practically all I care to say. All I wanted to do was to exonerate the people of Arizona, in whose probity and honor and integrity I have the greatest confidence, from the cold-blooded, brutal charge, as I think it was, that they are, upon such facts, to be branded as repudiationists, that they stand guilty, convicted by the Supreme Court of the United States, of having repudiated their just debts. If there is any record anywhere to justify such a charge I have not seen it. On the contrary, the record that I have seen shows that the people of Arizona did not do differently with regard to these bonded obligations than any other community in the United States would most probably have done. Scamps and scoundrels occasionally get into office in old as well as new communities. It is no unheard of thing for county officials to overstep their lawful rights, usurp authority, and issue invalid securities.

Only a few years ago our legislature passed a law called the "Boesel law," authorizing the construction by county aid of railroads in Ohio. Numerous enterprises were set on foot. Bonds were issued by county officials; they were sold, and after that they were held by the courts to be invalid. We had only recently a case of this kind arising in the city of my colleague. The legislature passed a law authorizing the taxation of all property in Cuyahoga County for the purpose of building an armory, and authorizing the issuance and sale of bonds to anticipate the revenues. Bonds were issued. They were put upon the market. They were sold for full value. With the proceeds they built the armory, and then after they had done so the county authorities in Cuyahoga County refused to levy the tax, although they had several times paid the interest on the bonds. They refused to continue to levy the tax rate to meet the interest and the principal of those bonds.

The holders went into the courts of Ohio and were there defeated, the supreme court of Ohio holding it was incompetent for the legislature, under the constitution of Ohio, to provide for a public improvement that belonged to the whole State and impose the whole burden of it upon the property in the single county where it was located. Thereupon the holders of those bonds went to the legislature of Ohio and they there procured a curative act, under which subsequently the holders got a judgment for the amount of their bonds, and ultimately the matter was taken care of.

The people of Cuyahoga County were not repudiationists, although the case against them was much stronger than this case against Arizona.

I mention this to show that it is no evidence of unfitness or incapacity for statehood that the legislature of the Territory, issuing bonds to aid railroads, may have issued invalid securities, the validity of which the people interested had the right to question in the courts, as they successfully did in this instance. There is not a State in this Union probably where the same thing has not occurred over and over again in some form or other.

When a community resists what it concedes to be an invalid and unlawfully issued security, it is not an evidence that they are dishonest. It is not an evidence that they are repudiators. Those are harsh words, Mr. President. In this case they are inexcusable.

Mr. President, in view of what has occurred here during the last hour, I am more thankful than ever that I am supporting this statehood bill. If there has been a clearer case made against Territorial government than this made here within the last hour, I have not heard of it. Here are people struggling to develop a community. They are an honest people. Their first and second memorials alike show that fact. I did not go beyond what the facts warranted me in saying when I stated that the Territorial legislature of Arizona figures in this matter far more creditably than the Congress of the United States. If there be fault anywhere to be found or to be laid, it is here, not there. They have acted not only honorably, Mr. President, but they have acted zealously to do their duty and their full duty. Is it to be wondered at that they were of the opinion, when they memorialized the Congress of the United States subsequent to the Supreme Court decision that the Pima County issue of bonds was invalid, that no act could be passed that would reach back and bring the dead to life.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me for one moment?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The question was raised by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] as to the source from which the legislation concerning this matter came. I hold in my hand a report made on a House bill legalizing these bonds, which bill was approved March 3, 1901. I will send it to the Senator. It appears that the Senator from Montana, Mr. Carter, made a favorable report from the Committee on Territories of the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I will ask that it may be read.

I have said all I care to say. I was just about to take my seat. I will stop only to emphasize what I said, that here we have an object lesson. Here are a people struggling in that frontier community to develop their industries, to acquire and build up railroads. They have peculiarly difficult conditions of nature there to deal with. They understand those conditions and can legislate about them far more intelligently than we can. We lack the necessary information for intelligent legislation. People come here. They bring in a measure. It is reported by some committee. It gets on the Calendar either as a separate bill or as an amendment to some bill, and before any Senator knows it, who has no special knowledge, it has become a law. That has happened over and over again. It happened so in this case—I will not say before any Senator knew it, but I will say that it happened so before many Senators could have known it.

I was here. I was pretty regular in my attendance. I never heard of any such bill. If I had heard of it and had comprehended what it meant, I would have certainly had a place in the RECORD showing that I was in opposition to any such measure, for I regard this legislation as absolutely tyrannical, oppressive, and unjust.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hold in my hand the report of the Committee on Territories upon the bill. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken in the report which he put in. This is a report made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] in favor of the bill. I think the bill was reported by the late Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know by whom it was reported.

Mr. ALDRICH. The report seems to have been made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have some Senator look at the RECORD now and see how much debate there was over it.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me just one moment, I simply want to say that the Senator from Rhode Island is manifestly mistaken in saying that I sent up the wrong bill. I ask unanimous consent that the report on this matter made by the Senator from Montana, Mr. Carter, be printed in the RECORD. I do not care to have it read.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to hear it.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have it read.

Mr. LODGE. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the act of June 6, 1896.

Mr. LODGE. And also there was an act of March 3, 1901. This is the act of June 6, 1896.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was the act of 1896 I had reference to, reported by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. LODGE. We passed a later act March 3, 1901.

Mr. ALDRICH subsequently said: Mr. President, in referring to the act of 1896 a few minutes ago, I stated that the report in favor of that act was made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS]. I made that mistake because it did not occur to me at the moment that there was any other Harris in the Senate at that time. It seems, however, that the Senator from Kansas was not then a member of the Senate and that the report was made by the late Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Harris. I make this statement in justice to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the report submitted in 1901 will be printed in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 265, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session.]

ISSUE OF BONDS BY SUPERVISORS, PIMA COUNTY, ARIZ.

[January 25, 1901.—Ordered to be printed.]

Mr. Carter, from the Committee on Territories submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 8068):

The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8068) authorizing the board of supervisors of Pima County, Ariz., to issue fifty-year 5 per cent bonds of Pima County, Ariz., to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said county, have examined the same, and recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendments:

In line 2 of the title of the bill strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

In line 9, page 3, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "four."

The report of the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives is hereto attached and made part of this report.

HOUSE REPORT.

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8068) authorizing the board of supervisors of Pima County, Ariz., to issue fifty-year 5 per cent bonds of Pima County, Ariz., to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said county, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass:

The first act bearing on this subject is the act of the Territorial legislature approved March 10, 1887, providing for outstanding indebtedness.

It provided for a loan commission to perform the duties prescribed by the act in the funding of the indebtedness, the commission to be composed of the governor, Territorial auditor, and Territorial secretary.

For existing indebtedness due and to become due the commission was empowered to issue negotiable coupon bonds of $1,000 each, with interest to be fixed by the commission.

This act, of course, provides for the whole procedure in the issuance of these bonds, providing for their final payment within twenty-five years, as the commissioners might fix. (Revised Statutes of Arizona, p. 361.)

Under this act, in 1887, Pima County issued $300,000 worth of 7 per cent bonds, and later the loan commission funded $103,000 of them in 5 per cent fifty-year bonds, and $147,000 of them are yet unfunded, the first installment of which—$25,000—falls due June 30, 1901, the levy for which, if this bill is not passed, will have to be made in August next.

In 1890 this act of the Territorial legislature was amended by Congress (U. S. Stat. L. 26, p. 175) so as to authorize the loan commission to issue bonds bearing interest not to exceed 5 per cent, and authorized the commission, on the request of counties and municipalities, to issue Territorial bonds in lieu of their indebtedness, to run fifty years, and to open up an account of the same with the counties and municipalities of the Territory, assuming their original obligation.

This act so amended, and approved as amended, provided that the same as amended, and the same is hereby provided and confirmed, subject to future Territorial legislation.

Now, following this, the Territorial legislature, March 19, 1891, passed an act approving of this funding act of the Territory enacted by Congress, amending chapter 1 of title 31 of the Revised Statutes, before referred to, and set the matter in motion as enacted by Congress and submitted to Territorial legislation afterwards. (Act 79, at page 97, Session Laws of Arizona of 1891.)

Following that, on June 6, 1896, Congress passed an act amending and extending the provisions of the act of Congress before named to the Territorial indebtedness, providing that the acts of Congress approved June 25, 1890, and August 3, 1894, authorizing the funding of the indebtedness of Arizona, be amended so as to authorize the funding of outstanding obligations of the Territory and to counties, municipalities, etc., until January 1, 1897, providing that all outstanding bonds, warrants, and other evidences of indebtedness of the Territory, counties, etc., heretofore authorized by legislative enactment of the Territory, bearing a high rate of interest, might be refunded into bonds bearing a lower rate. This might be done up to January 1, 1897, remember. That is its limitation.

After this act the general funding act before referred to, enacted by Congress, having provided that it should all be subject to future legislation, was again passed upon by legislature in 1899, found at page 39 of the laws of that session.

There they pass an act called "An act to abolish the loan commission and to repeal sundry laws thereto." The act was that paragraph 2939, section 1, chapter 1, title 31, of the revised statutes of Arizona, the one heretofore referred to, and also that section 1 of act 79, session laws of the sixteenth legislative assembly heretofore referred to, and acts 33 and 74 of the session laws of the eighteenth legislative assembly of the Territory, referring to all of the funding acts, are hereby repealed. It repealed them all, and in that condition we are now.

Now, in view of the fact that Congress, in amending and reenacting the funding law of Arizona, as before stated, provided that it should be subject to the future legislation of the Territory, and in view of the further fact that Congress in 1896 provided the limitation for funding the outstanding indebtedness at the date of January 1, 1897, and of the further fact that the legislature of Arizona, to whose jurisdiction Congress referred this funding business and subjected it to its power, repealed all these laws outright, we submit that the board of supervisors now have no authority under existing laws to issue bonds for the refunding of Pima County's indebtedness.

In view of the foregoing facts the passage of the bill is respectfully recommended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, until this afternoon I had no idea who owned the Pima County bonds or who the dangerous bondholders were to whom the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] has referred with so much fervor. It now appears that they belong to a firm of which Mr. Bird S. Coler is the head. It is true that he was the Democratic candidate for governor in the recent election in New York. That may have been his misfortune; but I do not think that it should exclude him from his rights as an American citizen to a payment of his just debts, and it does not seem to me that that fact at all touches the question which is here involved.

Neither, Mr. President, do I desire to suggest the charge which the Senator from Ohio has discussed with so much earnestness, that these people in Arizona are incompetent. They seem now to have displayed very great competency, perhaps more competency than some other qualities. But I should like to trace in my turn just what happened in Arizona, filling in a few omissions in the brilliant narrative of the Senator from Ohio.

In 1879 the Territorial legislature of Arizona authorized the building of this railroad. They authorized county aid to other railroads. I do not know whether there was any fraud in it or not. I do not know whether the honest builders of the waste places were led to pass these acts by the minion of the Federal Government in the position of governor, or by some governor's brother. It does not appear on the record. They seem to have passed these acts as set forth in the case of Lewis v. Pima County. In 1883 some of these bonds were issued. The Senator from Ohio says that not a foot of the railroad had been built. The Supreme Court says:

> There was nothing in evidence showing bad faith on the part of the railroad company, in so far as the first exchange of bonds was concerned——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what he is reading from?

Mr. LODGE. I am reading from the case of Murphy v. Utter, decided in the October term, 1901.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the volume?

Mr. LODGE. It is volume 186, page 112:

> There was nothing in evidence showing bad faith on the part of the railroad company, in so far as the first exchange of bonds was concerned—

That is, when they exchanged the railroad bonds with the county—

> nor is there any evidence which shows bad faith on the part of the company or its contractor, Walker and his principals, Coler & Co., except their failure to continue the building and equipment of the road after the completion of the 39 miles of grading and laying of 10 miles of track—

That is not very much, but it is more than a foot—

> except such inferences as may be drawn from the fact that both the railroad company and Coler & Co. had difficulty in raising the money for the payment of the work done, and did not have the resources to go on and complete the work.

That, I take it, is what happened with the railroad after the issue of the bonds. There is no suggestion of fraud so far anywhere. If there was any fraud in the passage of the original acts it must have been on the part of the Territorial legislature which passed those acts. But it does not appear that there was any fraud, and it is not suggested.

In Lewis v. Pima County, which was submitted on October 18, 1894, and decided the same month, the court decided the bonds invalid on the ground that their issue was ultra vires; that they had no power under the act of Congress to issue bonds for a purpose not strictly municipal or relating to the internal affairs of the county. There is no suggestion in that opinion that there was any fraud whatever.

Thereupon the Territorial legislature of Arizona came here with a memorial, which has been read, asking the Congress of the United States to validate railroad bonds. It mentioned none by name; it excluded none; it described them generally. That act was passed, in response to the demand of the Territorial legislature of Arizona on the 6th of June, 1896. Thereupon they proceeded to refuse to refund them through the loan commissioners. The court then decided, in the case of Utter v. Franklin, that the bonds were valid. Then the legislature of Arizona turned up here and asked Congress to enable them to repudiate the bonds.

Then an act was passed in 1901 validating the Pima County bonds expressly by name, and this further case, which was tried in October, 1901, volume 186, page 95, was on an appeal by the loan commissioners of Arizona from a judgment of the supreme court of that Territory rendered March 22, 1901, granting a peremptory writ of mandamus and commanding such loan commissioners, upon the tender by plaintiffs of $150,000 bonds of the county of Pima with coupons attached, described in the petition, to issue and deliver to the petitioners refunding bonds of the Territory pursuant to certain acts of Congress; and the court held, as it was decided in Utter v. Franklin (172 U. S., 416), that it was made the duty of the loan commissioners to fund the bonds in question. It was held that, if the defendant could be permitted to set up any new defenses at all without the leave of this court, it could not set up objections to the validity of bonds which existed and were known to the loan commissioners at the time the original answer was filed and before the case of Utter v. Franklin was heard or decided by this court.

Now, Mr. President, if those dates are followed the explanation is very simple. The Territorial legislature of Arizona authorized certain counties to do acts which, under the laws of Congress, they had no right to do. Then, when they got tired of paying the interest, and the railroad was only partially completed and could not be entirely completed, they declined to pay the interest. Thereupon a suit was brought on certain coupons, and the court held that the act, as it clearly was, was ultra vires. Then they found that their credit was impaired. Thereupon they came to Congress and got an act validating the bonds. Then when they found that they had to pay these other bonds, too, they undertook to get those repudiated. Then they got those confirmed, and now, after having asked to have the bonds confirmed, they have resisted them in every possible way in the courts.

It does not appear on the record presented to us that there was any fraud in the issue of bonds. Certainly the Supreme Court never made any such statement for a moment. But it does seem to me to show a very great looseness in legislation in that Territory and a very great indifference to obligations to this character. The way in which they first authorized bonds, then refused to pay them, then got legislation to validate them, then refused to pay them and resisted in the court, then got more legislation, then resisted that legislation, seems to me to indicate at least indifference to proper public obligations, which is unfortunate in a community which is asking for the highest rights which can be conferred on any community.

Whether they as a people are to blame for this, whether it is the fault of the brother of some governor, I do not know; but I do not think the history of those bonds is a creditable history to any community; and the fact that they are held in the State of New York by Mr. Coler or anybody else does not touch the question the least in the world.

The interest of the question here is twofold. Is there in that bill any sufficient provision for the protection of all bondholders who, in good faith, have loaned money to that community; and does that community show in its business transactions, of which this may be taken as a specimen, that fidelity to public pecuniary obligations which we have a right to demand from a State of the Union?

In my judgment, after listening to the debate and reading these cases this afternoon, it seems to me to throw grave doubt on their capacity as a community to deal properly with pecuniary obligations of this kind and an indifference to obligations which a State should hold sacred. It is not for them, after they have deliberately authorized the borrowing of money on certain terms, to turn around and try to get out of it. That is not the way public credit is preserved and made strong.

I am very glad, Mr. President, for one that this matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], for I think it throws an instructive, if not a pleasing, light on the methods of doing business in that legislature.

Mr. BEVERIDGE obtained the floor.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16604) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HALE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. BERRY were appointed.

ABANDONMENT OF PUBLIC ALLEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4221) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to extinguish a portion of an alley in square 189, which was, on page 2, line 6, to strike out all after the word "ground" down to and including the word "law" in line 14.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendments have been considered by the committee. I am authorized to move that the Senate agree to the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

ALLOTMENT OF CHIPPEWA INDIAN LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I have just received a message from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who says circumstances have arisen which render it important that a little bill here relating to the allotment of Indian lands shall be passed at once. It has been passed by the House, and I ask unanimous consent that the regular order may be temporarily laid aside, that Senate bill 2043 may receive consideration.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to ask if the communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is in writing?

Mr. QUARLES. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTON. My understanding is that it is not proper to make any statement here of a communication from a department unless it comes in writing. I think I shall have to object, as the same objection was made to a bill that I presented the other day.

Mr. QUARLES. I hope the Senator will not indulge in a suggestion of that kind. This is a bill of local importance in Wisconsin, and circumstances have arisen there which render it imperative that these allotments shall be made at once. It is a matter which, while it is local in its nature, is really one of great importance. The communication from the Commissioner was purely informal, and I simply spoke of it as an excuse for interrupting the important business of the Senate, which I should not assume to do on my own motion.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I will say——

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think I had the floor.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the Senator to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 10698) providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the Lac Courte Oreille and Lac du Flambeau reservations in the State of Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

Mr. QUAY. I will not object to it, understanding that it is a bill the Senator from Wisconsin says is of immediate importance, the passage of which is earnestly requested by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and that it will not cause debate.

Mr. QUARLES. It will create no debate. If it does, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. QUAY. I will not object so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate. There is nothing before the Senate until the question is settled whether or not the bill is objected to, and it can not be objected to until it is read to the Senate. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

SECTION 1. That with the consent of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior, located on the Lac Courte Oreille Reservation in the State of Wisconsin, to be obtained in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, the President may allot to each Indian now living and residing on said reservation and entitled to so reside, and who has not heretofore received an allotment not exceeding 80 acres of land, such allotments to be subject in all respects, except as to the age and condition of the allottee, to the provisions of the third article of the treaty with the Chippewas of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, concluded September 30, 1854.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 1 of this act shall also under same terms and conditions apply to the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior located on the Lac du Flambeau Reservation in the State of Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate shall consider this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to say that, having heard the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin respecting this bill, and knowing that the statement is correct, I will not make any objection at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS AT SCRANTON AND WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to lay aside informally the pending business and to pass a brief joint resolution which the public exigency requires shall be done without any delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 216) extending the provision granting to the State of Pennsylvania the use of the court-house at Scranton and Williamsport, Pa., to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that the provisions of the "Joint resolution granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-house at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa.," approved December 23, 1895, shall be continued with respect to the United States court-house at Williamsport, Pa., for the further period of five years from the date of the expiration of the permission therein referred to, upon the same terms and conditions as stated in said joint resolution, and that concurrent jurisdiction, so far as is necessary, over said property be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the State of Pennsylvania, so that the sessions of the superior court of said State in said Federal building and rooms thereof may be, during said period, fully legalized.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I do not intend to go into the particular matter, which has occupied the attention of the Senate this afternoon, either at large or in detail. Important and overwhelming as the reasons there appear as against the measure known as the omnibus bill, it was not a matter known to the committee nor upon which the committee based its report; and I did not know about it in its details until this afternoon. It is well because of the light which has been thrown upon the controversy that the matter has come up. I do not intend, I say, to discuss it, at this time at least, either at large or in detail; but I do feel that at this particular juncture, while the Chamber is still ringing with the words of the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], that attention should be called to some intemperate and certainly inaccurate expressions, upon which expressions was built a very passionate appeal to the Senate in behalf of the omnibus measure. I think, the Senators themselves will see that these utterances are, to say the least, extravagant.

We have heard these words spoken here, Mr. President, "The tyrannical power of Congress," "The tyrannical action of Congress." I took down the words of the Senator from Utah as he used them, that Congress had "the power to declare that the people of Pima County should pay $100,000,000;" and the Senator from Ohio frequently used the words "The arbitrary and tyrannical power of Congress," and then passionately appealed to us to relieve the people of those Territories from this despotism.

Mr. President, what is this power of which the Senators complain? The claim of such power was based upon this act validating those bonds. But what is the power? Does anybody believe, does the Senator from Utah—now that I have called his attention to it—believe that Congress has the power, unlimited and unrestricted, as he said, to create a debt of $100,000,000 or of $1 and put that on the Territories? Will any person, lawyer or layman, proclaim such a doctrine as that? Mr. President, I know that the Senator, who is an excellent lawyer, when not perhaps in the heat of advocacy, would not declare any such rule of law as that. Therefore what is that power? And was either Senator justified in the use of the adjectives "tyrannical" and "arbitrary," and especially were they justified in the excited appeals which they have made to the Senate to relieve the people of those Territories from this czar-like rule?

It is just this, Mr. President: The Congress of the United States, according to the Constitution, has power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the government of the Territories. Under that power the Territories have already been given by Congress almost unlimited power of absolute self-government. They elect their legislatures; they elect their Delegates to Congress; their legislatures pass practically all laws a State can pass; they have entire local self-government in their municipalities. They have all this except, Mr. President, in one particular, and I am very glad that this debate arose upon this question, if for no other purpose than to call attention to this one important limitation.

The Congress of the United States, taking counsel from experience, enacted a law that no municipality, nor the legislative assembly itself, of a Territory could go into debt or should load upon the people of that Territory a debt exceeding 4 per cent upon the assessed valuation of their property. Congress did that because it found that, without such a limitation, the spoilers, who go in there to execute certain schemes, would induce the people to load themselves with a debt which would weigh down upon their shoulders for a generation, and even more in some cases. So limitations were thrown around the power of the creation of debt.

Mr. President, occasionally it seems wise, as in the case of the bill now reported by our committee to the Senate and the bill now before the Senate, to remove that limitation. That is what was done in this case. A limitation which had been placed upon their power to indebt themselves has been taken off. Then, Mr. President, the Delegate came here representing the people, elected by the people, and asked Congress to relieve them of what? Of the protection which Congress had thrown around them. And because Congress did this we are told that we are exercising a tyrannical power. Is that true, Mr. President? Is it not true, on the contrary, that it is the exercise of a protecting power? Does anybody question the wisdom of the Harrison limitation of 4 per cent upon the indebtedness of the Territory? Yet that is the root of this matter.

Now, Mr. President, it thus appears that there has been no arbitrary or tyrannical action here. It thus appears that the Senator from Utah is hardly justified in saying that Congress could create a debt and load it upon these Territories, either $100,000,000 of debt or $1 of debt. Would either the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Ohio say that Congress would have power to pass an act, not based upon anything done there in the Territories at all, but power to pass an act creating $100,000,000 or $1 worth of debt, and then load it upon the Territory? And yet that is what the Senator said, and that is the thing upon which the Senators based their dramatic pleas for "self-government" for the people of that Territory. Does not the whole business show that this is an illustration of the wisdom of retaining a protecting power over the indebtedness of a Territory until it has achieved a certain condition of civil perfection entitling it to come into the Union?

Mr. President, suppose that this 4 per cent limitation was removed, as this bill will remove it—suppose that the people of New Mexico and the people of Arizona did not have the protection of the Harrison 4 per cent limitation—then any person who was adroit enough, or any person who had good enough cause, or any person who could in any way accomplish the end, could get subsidies voted for a railroad, or for any other enterprise, without any relief or any protection by that very provision which the Senators say is tyrannical.

Thus we see, Mr. President, that, instead of being a tyranny, it is a protection; it is a protection that those people shall not be permitted to plunge themselves into debt, which will weight them down and weight their children down for generations. That is the crux, Mr. President, of this whole business. So when the Senator from Ohio, with characteristic eloquence and passion, appeals to this Senate to relieve the people of these Territories of this tyranny, he appeals to them to destroy the protection which the Congress of the United States has thrown around them; and that, Mr. President, is the extent of it.

The Senator from Ohio was the author of one of the wisest laws I ever knew to be framed, to wit, the law for the government of Porto Rico. If the government that now exists over the Territories is "tyranny," as the Senator said, this Porto Rico act certainly is despotism; if this is tyranny, the government of the Philippines can not be designated by any adjective at present at hand. No Senator was more eloquent and persistent than the Senator from Ohio in showing that we were conferring both upon the people of Porto Rico and of the Philippines not despotism, but liberty, yet their government, in comparison with the self-government of the Territories, is only a fragment, a fraction.

So, Mr. President, we see that there is nothing here to relieve these people from the sway of a tyrannical exercise of power. There can not be, because we have protected them from plunging themselves and their children into debt beyond the 4 per cent assessed valuation of their property. This and other things of which everybody knows shows that it is a most salutary provision.

Mr. President, when it becomes necessary in the opinion of the people of the Territories that this protection should be removed, they come here to us—not their oppressors, but their brethren—and state the facts which make that case an exception; and the only thing that this Congress has power to do in such a case is to validate their act, which went outside of the limitations which for their safeguarding we throw around them. In other words, the people have two protections—the protection, first, of their legislature, and then, the supervising protection of Congress when they come here and ask to be relieved of that protection.

I appeal to any Senator, Does that look like tyranny? Is it not a wise provision? Is it not such a provision that a man engaged in business all his life would throw around these people for their protection, in view especially of the experience which they and the people of every other Territory have had?

I do not care to speak upon any phase of this subject except the root of the matter. I know nothing of the facts of this particular case, but it inspired the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio to use adjectives which the case hardly warrants, and then to build upon those adjectives the statement that we are exercising tyranny, that we were putting a debt upon those people, and an appeal that we should set them free. Thus we see "how a plain tale" puts them down. There is nothing of the kind which Senators have alleged. There is simply the protection of the 4 per cent limitation.

I have no doubt that very many want that protection removed, but not for the benefit of the people. If there is any enterprise down there which justifies Congress in its good judgment in permitting those people to go beyond the indebtedness of 4 per cent, undoubtedly Congress will permit them to do so; but while they are in the formative period, while they are in the developing period, while the conditions exist that we all know always accompany new communities, is it a wise thing that that protection shall be taken entirely away? Is the supervising judgment of Congress worth nothing? Is it likely that any equitable scheme, that any wise proposition which is put forward by them to take them out of the 4 per cent limitation, or any other limitation, will be negatived by Congress?

So we see, Mr. President, that there was not the creation of a debt here by Congress. There was the invalidation of certain of their own acts upon the petition of the Delegate from the Territory, elected by the people themselves, as I am informed. I say again that I know little about this particular case.

Therefore, Mr. President, this case aside, the whole point made by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio falls to the ground. I am not making any point whether this business—uncommon, unusual, and extraordinary, to say the least—shows that the people are not capable of self-government. I have replied to and attempted to overthrow the conclusion built upon that by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio, that Congress has created a debt here in the exercise of tyrannical power which resides in us by the Constitution, and I have shown that no such power as that does reside in Congress.

When the Senator from Utah said that this Congress had the power to create a debt of $100,000,000 and put it on Pima County or any other municipality in any Territory, he made a statement which he would not repeat after calm reflection.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RAWLINS. What I said was that the Supreme Court of the United States had held these bonds invalid and, therefore, not a debt of Pima County. Congress passed an act, and then, when the question as to certain bonds came before the Supreme Court by reason of the act of Congress, the Supreme Court held they had become a debt. I draw the conclusion from those two premises that when the first decision was rendered there was no debt; when the second decision was rendered there had been no action by the Territorial authorities, but only action by Congress. The Supreme Court declared that there was a debt, and therefore Congress by its act made a debt.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I do not propose to answer the Senator upon that point, because I have stated that I did not intend to argue this case at large or in detail so far as this particular question is concerned. I know nothing of it except as here developed, and the committee's opposition to this bill is not based on it; but well I know, because I wrote it down as the Senator spoke and caught the words from his lips, that the Senator then proceeded to say that it illustrated the whole villainous system under which these people were oppressed, and that Congress had power to declare the people of Pima County should pay $100,000,000. I know it was stated by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Ohio that Congress could create a debt—"saddle it off," was the phrase used, "upon the people of a Territory."

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand the Senator to claim that the only element of fraud in these bonds was that they were issued in excess of the 4 per cent limitation?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know nothing about that, Mr. President. I have said two or three times that I am not familiar with the details of this transaction and am not arguing this transaction.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is simply arguing, then, the constitutional question which the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] raised about Congress imposing upon those people a debt of $100,000.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, I am arguing, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. That is a moot question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it is a moot question, too, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] by their eloquence attempted to vitalize it into a present question, and that present question, really a moot question, thus vitalized, is the question to which I am attempting to reply. I do not know whether I shall be successful or not.

The Senator from Utah may be right about what he said, but I am right about the conclusion he drew and the conclusion the Senator from Ohio drew. The argument which they made upon that point was that this very fact showed that we ought to relieve these people of this tyranny; and I am showing that there is no tyranny, but only protection, from which the people of that Territory may well pray that they shall not be relieved. I do not think the Senator, in fact I know that he would not have sat down and indorsed the statement that the Congress of the United States had the power, unlimited, as he said, to load upon the people of those Territories either one hundred million dollars, or one hundred dollars, or one hundred cents, because, of course, the Senator would not maintain any such proposition. But the whole business brings it down to the wisdom of the limitations of 4 per cent and other limitations, which Congress, in its wisdom, having drawn that wisdom from the wells of experience in this business, has put about the people of those Territories.

I say further that it illustrates merely this, that when the people have a cause, as in the case of the Maricopa County bonds which is now before the Senate, which justifies Congress in taking those limitations off from any locality, they can depend upon the good judgment, the good sense, the wisdom, and the patriotism of Congress to temporarily suspend that limitation. Instead, therefore, of tyranny, we have merely wisdom; instead of arbitrary power, we merely have the application of common sense and common justice to save the people of these new communities from the spoilers until they are strong enough and numerous enough to carry on a State government of their own.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—I do not know where he is now—was about to take the floor upon this bill when this debate, most unexpected, was precipitated upon the Senate. I understand he desires to go on in the morning. If that is agreeable——

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I suggest there is not a quorum of the Senate present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Platt, Conn.
Alger,	Culberson,	Heitfeld,	Quay,
Allison,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Rawlins,
Bacon,	Dolliver,	Jones, Ark.	Scott,
Bate,	Dryden,	Jones, Nev.	Simmons,
Berry,	Dubois,	Kean,	Simon,
Beveridge,	Elkins,	Kittredge,	Stewart,
Blackburn,	Foraker,	McCumber,	Taliaferro,
Burnham,	Foster, Wash.	McEnery,	Tillman,
Burrows,	Frye,	McLaurin, Miss.	Turner,
Burton,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Warren,
Carmack,	Gamble,	Mason,	Wellington.
Clapp,	Gibson,	Nelson,
Clark, Wyo.	Hale,	Penrose,
Clay,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,

Mr. BEVERIDGE. My colleague [Mr. FAIRBANKS] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. My colleague [Mr. MONEY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate by sickness in his family.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PRITCHARD] is unavoidably absent from the Senate on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In response to the roll call 57 Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. QUAY. Now, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever to try to force the Senate into an executive session, if the Senator from Pennsylvania has any business of importance to present. But certainly there are confirmations which we should take up, and my sole object in making the motion was to attend to them. Therefore I withdraw the motion to go into executive session.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had prepared to follow the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], but a debate suddenly sprang up here this afternoon and has occupied the attention of the Senate until this moment. Otherwise the Senator from Massachusetts would now be on his feet addressing the Senate, and would address it no doubt at any length satisfactory to the Senator from Pennsylvania. He is now out of the Chamber, however, and has notified me that he desires to go on to-morrow morning.

Unless the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to hold the Senate in night session and in continuous session, there is no reason why we should not adjourn at this hour. If it is the Senator's desire to put this matter, not to the test of argument within usual hours, when we will meet the Senator by legitimate debate, but merely to a test of sheer physical strength, so far as I am concerned I am inclined to accommodate the Senator. I think, perhaps, we will stand that sort of business as long as anybody. But it is not done, if it is done, Mr. President, for the purpose of having the Senate hear a usual debate in usual hours, and the Senator from Pennsylvania knows it. This debate has proceeded, especially during the last week, along most legitimate lines, as is demonstrated by the fact that upon almost every day Senators on the other side of this question have engaged Senators on this side of the question. That is, both sides——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is just outside the door looking into the Chamber? [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have no doubt we are greatly benefited by the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, whenever he gives it, through the door or otherwise, and the Senator from Ohio has demonstrated the fact that he is a most excellent watchman for the Senate. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] the other day designated himself as the scimiter of the Senate [laughter], and now we can designate the Senator from Ohio, by his own act, as the watchman of the Senate; and between the scimiter and the watchman——

Mr. FORAKER. While we are at it, what shall we say of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think you are quite competent to take care of that subject. I feel safe in the hands of the Senator from Ohio.

What I was saying before was in entire earnest. I say that if it is meant to reduce this matter, not to a question of the contest of argument, which has proceeded most legitimately and according to usual methods, but to a sheer question of physical endurance, in the attempt to hold the Senate up until this bill shall be passed or all legislation defeated, I for one shall not resist it. But the Senator can not expect that those of us upon this side who are prepared to argue this matter before the Senate in the usual hours and in the usual way will be forced by a night session and unusual and illegitimate hours to use the same argument that we would make during the usual hours of this body.

Nobody can say that the debate which has proceeded here for a week has been uncommon or extraordinary. Upon the contrary, that it has been a most legitimate debate is proven by the fact it has been participated in most vigorously by Senators on the other side—by Senators supporting the Senator from Pennsylvania. It has been participated in with great vigor, and to the edification of this body, by the Senator from Ohio, by the Senator from Utah, by the Senator from Georgia, by the Senator from Nevada, by the Senator from Kansas, by the Senator from North Dakota.

Is debate like that, Mr. President, any evidence that there is delay? Not at all. If, then, it be established that this debate has proceeded thus far along usual and legitimate lines, as is proven by the fact that both sides have participated in it, I do not know what reason there can be for the Senator to ask a continuous session, as his attitude leads me to believe he is asking. He may ask it, if he will. I for one will not contest the point with him. I accept the challenge which the Senator seems inclined to throw down; but if he does so challenge us he may know that he will be required to keep a quorum in this Chamber ever five minutes. Methods like those, most unusual and uncalled for, are to be met by the requirement that those who say it shall be done shall stay here while it is done.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, there is no question of physical endurance involved in a protraction for some time of to-day's session. On the mere matter of physique, as a matter of course, the opponents of the statehood bill are fully the equals of its advocates. But it is desired by the friends of the bill to make progress to-day, and it is believed that by continuing the session a few hours longer we may dispose, as I have said before, of some of the brushwood in the face of important legislation in this body outside of the statehood bill.

There is no desire to interfere with the physical comfort of any Senator on this floor, and there is no desire, either, to protract debate upon this question, and if the opponents of the bill will to-day name a date for a final vote, any time within thirty days from to-day, I will guarantee that there will be no further disposition upon the part of its friends to press the discussion of this bill. As it is, my proposition is that we sit to-night to make some progress with the bill—the proposition which was imagined by, but, I think, not communicated to, the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not a mind reader, and when the Senator is imagining a proposition he might communicate it. There is no desire on the part of the opponents of the bill not to continue or press the debate upon it. On the contrary, we do intend to press debate upon it; and day by day have done so.

The Senator from Pennsylvania the other day said he hoped the Senator from Indiana was prepared to put up his men. It was most unusual language for the Senate of the United States, where Senators representing great States are supposed to debate upon and reason the questions which come before them and the measures upon which they are to pass. But if the Senator meant by "putting up his men" that Senators upon our side of the controversy ought to be prepared to argue the question before the Senate, I will assure the Senator that the Senator from Indiana will "put up his men." They are not my men, or anybody's men—and that suggests a difference not necessary now to enlarge upon. They are men who, of their own volition, propose to argue this question to the Senate of the United States, as is their duty under their oaths, as they conceive it, and to give to the Senate and to the country their reasons for their attitude upon this matter.

But is it reasonable for the Senator to ask them to do that in unusual and illegitimate and desperate hours? We do not think so. We think that is a mere challenge to physical endurance; and if it is such, I say to the Senator, "We take up your challenge." I will not resist the Senator's attempt to do anything of the kind, but he can not expect that arguments, serious, well-considered, carefully prepared, which Senators—and Senators of experience and eminence equal to that of the Senator from Pennsylvania, great as that is—have been preparing upon points which have not yet been answered will be delivered in unusual and extraordinary hours. Therefore the Senator must be prepared to receive what he ought to expect. If he wants to continue the session, he can continue it without opposition from me, but he must understand——

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; excuse me just a moment. He must understand that he will not get that kind of argument, and furthermore that he will be required to keep the quorum which decides upon that thing in the Senate Chamber every five minutes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it was my intention to speak this afternoon on the statehood bill. I have here some notes that I have been making. I had prepared myself to speak upon this question, and I was to go on when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] concluded in the afternoon. The debate upon the Pima County bonds sprang up, and the whole afternoon has been consumed.

What I desire to say on this bill, which I regard as an important measure, I have prepared with some care; and although it may seem to the Senator from Pennsylvania merely the brushwood of the debate that is to be cleared away, it does not appear so to me. I should like to speak at a reasonable time. I have been in the Capitol, as all other Senators have been, since 10 or half past 10 o'clock this morning. I do not want to go on at this hour and make the argument I desire to make, and I confess I am tired, as I suppose we all are.

I remember that when I was trying to get the Philippine bill through last year, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] said to me, I think more than once, that he thought nothing would be gained by stringent and harassing methods. It was a moment when I was extremely anxious to get a vote, when the temptation to press the Senate into unusual hours was very strong, but I acceded——

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LODGE. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. But I yielded to the advice of the Senator from Arkansas, as he is well aware. I endeavored to avoid in that debate any harassing of Senators. I do not recall that I ever insisted on any Senator going on when he expressed a desire to be relieved; and I did not press it unduly.

If we undertake night sessions and unusual hours, harassing methods, they are sure to lead to corresponding methods of obstruction. The Senator from Pennsylvania is as well aware of that as any Senator in this Chamber. He knows what is the capacity for obstruction under the Senate rules. We all remember when he made a certain tariff speech here, and finally that speech became so impressive that he merely had to draw the manuscript out and place it on his desk and at the sight of the manuscript the managers of the bill would accept his amendment.

I remember coming into the Senate one afternoon. I went into the cloakroom, and I met the Senator from Pennsylvania walking up and down the room, smoking his cigar, I think, and I said to him, "What is going on in the Senate?" He said, "I am making a speech." [Laughter.] I found he had been fatigued, which was not surprising, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was kindly reading a portion of his manuscript for him, and when he recovered he came in and renewed his speech.

I do not instance that except to show that there is a capacity for obstruction which is very great under the Senate rules if Senators will resort to it. But it will not be resorted to, and it never will be resorted to, unless Senators are harassed by unusual hours, by being kept here at night. Then obstruction comes, and I have never seen it advance legislation at all.

I remember very well the long struggle of three months the first year I was in the Senate, when we had the contest over the repeal of the Sherman Act. We were held here then in continuous session. It did not advance or quicken the action on that bill one particle, and I do not think those extreme measures ever do. They produce more or less irritation, a great deal of discomfort, but they can not advance measures, because they give rise at once to the tactics of obstruction; and the tactics of obstruction are infinite under these rules.

Now, on the very matter of the morning hour, if those of us who are opposed to the statehood bill were disposed to filibuster or make obstruction, the Senator from Pennsylvania is well aware that we have nothing to do but to have bills read at the desk. We can call for the first reading of every bill. We can have bills read at the desk and kill the morning hour entirely. But, Mr. President, I think it is most undesirable to resort to such measures. I do not want to sit here and call for a quorum and fill up the time by reading from books, and try to get through the night in that way. It seems to me it leads to no good object.

I have been led on to make these general remarks simply because I was the Senator who was going on this afternoon. I was all ready to go on. I had prepared with some care what I might wish to say in order not to consume a great deal of time. It is not a written speech. I am very averse—in fact, I not desire to go on with that speech to-night. I want to deliver the speech, such as it is, when I am reasonably fresh and in the course of the day, when the Senate is more disposed to listen to arguments than it can be at the end of a long and fatiguing day. I hope that we shall not be pressed into a night session to-night.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator from Massachusetts excuse me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I want to ask the Senator a question. He spoke of his efforts to get a vote on the Philippine bill. Did he not press and secure from the minority an agreement to vote at a fixed time, and did he not also have assurances all through that there was no purpose on the part of those who were opposing the Philippine bill to prevent a vote on the bill? Is there not that difference between that case and this? Here there is a purpose to prevent any vote on the pending bill. If that is not proclaimed openly on the floor, it is proclaimed no less openly in private conversation. It is said that those who are opposing this bill do not intend that the Senate shall have an opportunity to vote on it if they have to prolong the debate until the end of the session.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, seven weeks elapsed before I got an agreement to vote on the Philippine bill, and we were then sitting every day. No recess had intervened, as there has in this case, and a great deal of time has been taken up with other matters.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. The point in the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee and the distinction between the two cases is this: During all that term of protracted debate the Senator from Massachusetts had the assurance that he was to have a vote on his bill. If the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Indiana and the other Senators on this floor who are opposing this bill intimate anything they intimate that we will never have a vote on it. That is a very marked difference between the Philippine bill and the statehood bill.

Mr. LODGE. Assurances were given at various times by the opposition that they would allow a vote some time on the Philippine bill. I remember that; but I also remember very well that there have been plenty of measures before the Senate as to which no such assurances were ever given. I am not speaking of myself with respect to the pending bill, for I have no right to give or withhold assurances. I remember that on the silver bill no assurance of any kind was ever given.

Mr. HOAR. Will my colleague allow me? A Senator rose in his place on the silver bill and said, "You all know very well that you never can get a vote on this bill."

Mr. STEWART and Mr. DUBOIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there have been during my short service in the Senate many efforts to adopt the previous question with some limitations. The reply always has been that a majority would finally reach a vote; that there would be a vote on the subject during the session, always, and it was difficult to point to a case where a vote had been prevented. The majority got an opportunity to vote. Consequently those in favor of free discussion gave up the effort for the previous question. The liberty of debate here has at all times depended upon the understanding that a vote would be had during the session in any case where there was a clear majority.

With respect to this bill, there is a clear majority in its favor, as the vote shows. Long speeches have been made. It is said they have not been made for the purpose of delay, but no one would want to talk three or four days on this bill if he did not want to consume time. It is too obvious that they are consuming time. There is no question about that. I hear it on every hand that there shall not be a vote on this question. If that is pressed and there can not be a vote on this question, what becomes of the argument in favor of free speech here? It is the only body in the United States, almost in the world, where there is really free speech and deliberation. It is preserved by the moderation and good sense of the Senate.

I think this has gone far enough. If the opposition will not agree on a day to vote, to carry out what has been the general understanding of the Senate, and if there can not be a vote upon this measure, the party in favor of the previous question, the gag rule, will prevail, and that very soon. Heretofore it has been impossible to show where a great outrage had been committed, where the majority had been thwarted absolutely; and attention being called to that fact, everybody has yielded. It was said, "You had better go on and delay some and have long debates and some inconvenience rather than be deprived of the privilege of free speech and unlimited discussion," which I regard as one of the most important factors in free government. There ought to be a place where there is no limitation upon debate, except what the body may place upon itself; but after debate is exhausted, there ought to be a vote.

I think the minority, if they will think it over, will agree that they had better give an assurance, as they did in the Philippine case, that there will be a vote; and that will silence everything. Let us fix a day. Then everybody will be satisfied, and the will of the majority will be carried into effect, which is all important. The will of the majority should prevail. That is one important and necessary thing; and the other is that we have free speech, and be untrammeled. I hope the Senate on this occasion will come up to its former standard and maintain its historical record of allowing a majority to have a vote upon this important question.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, the case cited by the junior Senator from Massachusetts and the suggestion made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts were in reference to a clear case of filibuster on the silver bill. The senior Senator from Massachusetts said they were openly notified by the opponents of the bill that they never intended that a vote should be had. If that is true it was a clear case of filibustering, and constitutes no precedent or justification for this action, unless the gentlemen themselves are filibustering.

Mr. ALLISON. We did have a vote on the silver bill.

Mr. CARMACK. You had a vote finally.

Mr. BERRY. We admitted we were filibustering.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, everybody who has been in the Senate any great length of time can not fail sometimes in rather amusing fashion to see how Senators change their minds according to the situation. I know I commiserated the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] at the last session when he had in charge the Philippine bill. Managing it as he did, with great good nature and good sense, and not, to use his word, harassing anybody, still at times he felt very impatient, and he thought we ought to have a rule to bring Senators right up to the ringbolt and make them vote. I used to say to him, "That is this side of the question just now; some time there will be positions and conditions where you and I will not feel as we do about this matter."

The general good sense of the Senate settles all those questions. On any debatable subject, where the lines are drawn, not party lines, but between for and against, we have to go on in a reasonable way and do things.

I have not any idea, Mr. President, that this morning when we came here any Senator supposed he was going to be asked to stay all night and fritter away the session. Night sessions do not accelerate the progress of any measure. Every one of us who has had any experience in such sessions knows that they all result in the same thing.

The Senator from Pennsylvania was very good-natured in managing this matter, and I do not blame him for resorting to just what he has resorted to; but he has a determined force against him, as he has a determined force in his favor, and he can not hold the Senate here to-night through the whole night. If he tries it, it will have the invariable result that after a little time Senators on both sides who had not expected to stay here will not stay, and there will be a demonstration of a desire to force this measure, and it will end in an adjournment. That is what it will end in. It will end in an adjournment.

I am inclined to think now that if the Senator from Pennsylvania should make a motion to adjourn, he would have the unanimous consent of his side and this side, too. I am inclined to think that if I made the motion it would carry, not that it would indicate that Senators on his side are not faithful to him, but they do not expect and did not expect this morning to stay here.

Now, there is great force in what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has put in good-natured fashion. He did not precipitate the debate to-day. He was really and actually ready to go on, but some kind friend suggested that we have a roll call, to get him a good audience. All the Senators were here, and he was ready to go on. He was interrupted by a discussion, not on any side matter, not on foreign, extraneous matter——

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Massachusetts yielded to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to make a speech, and then the other debate arose.

Mr. LODGE. No; I never took the floor at all. I was ready to take the floor.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts was ready to take the floor when the Senator from Connecticut spoke.

Mr. BERRY. As I remember it the Senator from Connecticut began his statement by saying that the Senator from Massachusetts was going to make a speech, but had in the meanwhile yielded to him for a short statement.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator from Massachusetts had not taken the floor.

Mr. BERRY. That is my recollection about it, and the Senator from Connecticut did take the floor and thereupon the debate arose.

While I am up I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question, if he will answer it. The Senator from Maine says that this thing of a vote has always been settled by the good sense of the Senate, that nothing has ever been made by staying at night session, and the Senate has always shown a desire to finally settle it. Now, this bill has been pending here since the 10th day of December, I think, and this is the 27th of January. I ask the Senator if he does not think it has been going on long enough to have some reasonable day in the future fixed when a vote can be had?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have not yet had a chance to make a speech on it myself. I wish to discuss the whole subject-matter. I have very strong views on it. I have never had a chance to discuss it, and I do not think any question about taking a vote on any given day should be forced upon us until Senators have had an opportunity to be heard.

But I do not want to go into that. I only wanted to call to the minds of Senators their individual experience about this plan of holding Senators here, without notice, in a night session, and obliging a Senator who is ready to go on at 2 or 3 o'clock to proceed at 6 o'clock or half past 6.

Mr. QUAY rose.

Mr. HALE. I am inclined to make the motion myself, unless the Senator from Pennsylvania rises for that purpose.

Mr. QUAY. He does not, but will very distinctly antagonize it. I rose to ask whether I might interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes.

Mr. QUAY. I wish to ask him whether he can possibly be brought to agree that a vote upon this question shall be taken at 2 p. m. on Tuesday, the 17th of February?

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that that is a very nice hour in the day, Mr. President, and I have no doubt it is a very good day in itself. I do not know of anything in nature which opposes it. But I am not prepared now to agree to that or to any other proposition, I will say to the Senator frankly.

Mr. QUAY. I think I can make one. The Senator is a fair-minded man and certainly would agree that a vote should be be taken at some time before the 3d of March.

Mr. HALE. Well, I am not prepared——

Mr. ALDRICH. Why not after the 3d of March?

Mr. QUAY. Because Congress will not be in session.

Mr. ALDRICH. It will be in session next December.

Mr. HALE. The Senate is now here, and I will risk making a motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. QUAY. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate do now adjourn, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to repeat what I said. I have no desire to interfere with the physical comfort of anyone.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, debate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order. The yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLLIVER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. I understand that my pair has been transferred to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS]. With that understanding, I vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut (when Mr. HAWLEY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is absent from the Senate on account of his health. He is paired, I understand, with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. KITTREDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. QUARLES (when his name was called). For the purposes of this question I stand paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RAWLINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not know whether he has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] has not voted, the Chair is informed.

Mr. SIMMONS. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] would undoubtedly vote "yea." So that releases the Senator from South Carolina from his pair, if he desires to vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. I prefer to observe the pair in his absence, not knowing what he would do on this occasion.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. WETMORE] is absent on account of slight illness, and is paired with the Senator from Georgia, I think.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Which Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ALDRICH. He is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, I understand.

Mr. BLACKBURN (after having voted in the negative). I will inquire if the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I will withdraw my vote. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am reminded that I have a pair extending over two days, of which this is one, with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK]. I assume that he would vote "nay" if he were here. Therefore I withdraw my vote, though it is perfectly immaterial to me how I did vote. I do not care.

Mr. CULBERSON. My colleague [Mr. BAILEY] has a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], but I understand that temporarily he is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. GIBSON (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KEARNS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. GIBSON. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. QUARLES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SPOONER] is absent from the city on necessary business. I wish to inquire if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] is present?

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] has voted. The Senator's colleague is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. QUARLES. Then a transfer was made.

Mr. BATE. The pair was transferred from the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MALLORY] left the Senate not feeling very well. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I will announce for the entire day that my colleague [Mr. MONEY] is unavoidably absent from the Senate because of sickness in his family, and he has a general pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PRITCHARD] is absent on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Aldrich,	Clark, Wyo.	Hale,	Simon,

Dietrich,	McComas,	Platt, N. Y.
Dillingham,	McEnery,	Pritchard,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I for one am not displeased at the result. I said before, when it became apparent that it was the intention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to resort to the unusual tactics to which he has resorted, if the Senator from Pennsylvania desired to take this matter out of the realms of legitimate discussion and to force us into unusual hours, so far as I was concerned I had no objection to that course; that if he wished to throw down the challenge of a mere test of physical endurance, so far as I was concerned we were willing and prepared to take it up.

It will be found, Mr. President, that the Senator can not expect—no reasonable man who voted to continue here could expect—that the same arguments would be presented during the inexcusable hours in which the Senator has asked us to stay here that the Senators would present during the usual hours in this body. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was prepared to go on. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] has prepared an elaborate argument upon this question. He has not his papers here to go on, and, I have no doubt, would not do it at this hour under the circumstances, anyhow.

But I have no doubt, Mr. President, that the Senator from Pennsylvania can be accommodated, and that at once, by a proper demonstration as to how time, unusual and inexcusable, lamplight and midnight time, can be occupied, as given by a precedent established by the Senator from Pennsylvania himself. During legitimate hours we will engage in legitimate debate. During illegitimate hours there is no objection to following the precedent of the Senator from Pennsylvania in this Chamber. I understand that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is now prepared to proceed to address the Senate and to give a lucid exposition of the way that can be done.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I am through.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the Senate go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I shall not again announce my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], and will not vote unless the Senator should come into the Chamber.

Mr. CARMACK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], but as I understand a transfer has been arranged so that he stands paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], I vote "nay."

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. KITTREDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], but my pair has been transferred to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. DIETRICH].

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and withhold my vote. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] did not vote. I have a general pair with that Senator, and I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. JENKINS. I call up the bill (H. R. 15331) to amend an act to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases, approved August 8, 1890.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 728 of the Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large of the United States, approved August 8, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon entering or upon arrival within the boundary of such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise."

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon arrival within the boundary of such State or Territory before and after delivery be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

"SEC. 2. That all corporations and persons engaged in interstate commerce shall, as to any shipment or transportation of fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids, be subject to all laws and police regulations with reference to such liquors or liquids or the shipment or the transportation thereof of the State in which the place of destination is situated, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of such liquors or liquids being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases."

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, we should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] who reported the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the best explanation that can be made of the bill is the report of the committee, a unanimous report, which I ask may be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following [By Mr. CLAYTON] report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15331) to amend an act to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases, approved August 8, 1890, having considered said bill, submit the following report:

Nearly all of the States have passed laws, as police regulations, differing to some extent in their provisions, for the prohibition, regulation, or control of intoxicating liquors within their respective boundaries.

In the case of Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) the Supreme Court held that any citizen of a State had the right under the Constitution of the United States to import any intoxicating liquors into another State, and that in the absence of Congressional permission the State into which such liquors were imported had no power, in the exercise of its authority of police regulations, to enact laws to prohibit or regulate the sale of such liquors while they remained in the original packages.

The effect of this decision of the Supreme Court was to deny to the States all power to control or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors transported from one State into another while they remained in the original packages.

To remove the effect of this decision, and to authorize the several States in the exercise of their police powers, to prohibit or control the sale of intoxicating liquors, the act of August 8, 1890, was passed. That act provided "that all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent, and in the same manner, as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State and Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise."

In the case In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545) the Supreme Court of the United States held that this act was constitutional and valid, and conferred upon the States the powers enumerated therein. But in the case of Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 415) a question arising under this act again came before the Supreme Court, and, in defining the scope and meaning of the act, the court held that under its provisions liquors transported from one State into another remained under the protection of the interstate-commerce laws until they were delivered to the consignee, and that the State law was inoperative to reach them until they were delivered by the common carrier to the person to whom they were consigned.

The effect of this decision was practically to nullify the act of 1890 so far as the transportation and delivery of intoxicating liquors within the State was concerned. Under the law, as thus construed, dealers in intoxicating liquors located in some of the States sent out their soliciting agents and established agencies in other States, who traveled over and canvassed the country and solicited sales and took orders for intoxicating liquors to be shipped in by the principal, consigned to the subscribers—sometimes to be sent to them direct, and in other cases to be sent to them in care of the soliciting agent.

By this method regular business of dealing in intoxicating liquors by the foreign dealer has been kept up in many of the States with impunity. Under this system the States are entirely powerless either to prohibit such sales or to exercise any control or regulation over them. They can not even impose a license or any restrictions whatever on the business carried on in this manner.

It is the purpose of this bill to correct this evil and to subject intoxicating liquors imported from one State into another to the jurisdiction of the laws of the State into which they are imported on the arrival of such liquors within the boundaries of such State.

Your committee therefore reports the bill back to the House with the following substitute amendment, and recommends that the bill as amended do pass:

"That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundary of such State or Territory, before and after delivery, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

"SEC. 2. That all corporations and persons engaged in interstate commerce shall, as to any shipment or transportation of fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids, be subject to all laws and police regulations with reference to such liquors or liquids, or the shipment or the transportation thereof, of the State in which the place of destination is situated, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of such liquors or liquids being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases."

Mr. MADDOX (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, this reading of the report does not amount to anything unless we can hear it. I think that if the gentleman from Alabama will read the report or make a statement as to the effect of the bill, we shall all of us comprehend the matter better.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that a point of order of this same character was made yesterday; but within two minutes afterwards the gentleman who had made the point was creating more confusion than anybody else. The Chair therefore hopes that all gentlemen will help to maintain such order as will enable members to understand what is proceeding. The Clerk will continue the reading of the report.

The reading of the report was resumed and concluded.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of gentlemen on this side of the House I desire to make a brief statement. In the first place, this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary by a unanimous vote; and secondly, the bill is made necessary by reason of decisions which have been rendered under the Wilson Act—the original-package decisions. Those decisions have had the effect to greatly qualify, if not to nullify, the intention of certain provisions of the Wilson Act. This bill proposes to amend that act, although it does not so state in its title. The committee were of the opinion that inasmuch as the Wilson law had been pronounced constitutional it would be better to let that whole legislation, which was had in the interest of good morals and in furtherance of the police powers of the States, stand, and to report an original proposition adding to the merits of the Wilson bill.

The decisions to which I have referred are stated with some degree of fullness in the report which I had the honor to present to the House in behalf of the committee. Under these decisions, to which I have made brief reference, it was held that as long as the intoxicating liquor imported into a State having prohibition laws was in the original package, and until it was delivered to the consignee, it was a subject of interstate commerce, and the police regulations and laws of the States could in no wise interfere. Under that ruling of the court the practice has grown up in the State of Iowa, and perhaps in other States where soliciting agents visit communities where the moral sentiment of the people is against the sale of intoxicating liquors—the practice has grown up for such soliciting agents to establish the business of taking orders from whomsoever may give them for liquor, the order for which would be sent to another State and then the liquor shipped, in some instances to the agent as consignee, and by him distributed to his customers; or, in some instances, the liquor would be sent directly to the customer. By this means the soliciting agent has been permitted under those decisions, and is permitted, as the law stands, to carry on the business of a liquor dealer in communities where the laws of a State and the moral sentiment of the people are to the contrary.

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

Mr. CLAYTON. In one moment I will yield to the gentleman. This act is made necessary to meet that exigency. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I will say to those who believe in the doctrine—once so largely believed by many, now, as we constantly hear, exploded, but which is still cherished by some of us, whatever is left of it, the doctrine of State rights—that there is nothing here to militate against our ideas on that subject. On the contrary, this is a proposition to surrender back to the States certain control which was given by the Federal Constitution under the commerce clause to Congress, the exercise of which power has, according to these decisions to which I have referred, nullified the police regulations of the States. In other words, this is simply a proposition to restore to the States in this matter full and ample power to enforce their police regulations against the sale of intoxicating liquors. That is the whole question.

I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend whether the effect of this bill would not be this: Suppose the gentleman or myself were residents of a prohibition State, say the State of Maine, the State of Kansas, or the State of Iowa, or even some of the Southern prohibition States. Suppose the gentleman, for private use or his private table, desires a glass of malt liquor, or whatever it may be. Not being able to get it in his own State, he orders it somewhere, say in St. Louis or Chicago or any large city where it is sold. Will not the effect of the passage of this bill be that the State authorities under the State law can prohibit getting that package to your or my State?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; I do not think the bill goes to that extent. No, sir.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In other words, in my judgment, the private citizen will be prevented from supplying his table with what he desires.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; I do not think it goes to that extent. On the contrary, I am sure it does not go to that extent. It is designed to break up the practice to which I have referred, and I have no idea that it can be construed or stretched to go beyond meeting the abuse to which I have referred, and which has necessitated the passage of this act.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Before the gentleman proceeds, I would like to say that this is to prevent that manner of sale of goods, and not to prevent the gentleman from Missouri, or any other man who wants to take a drink, from taking it or from using it on his table, to use the gentleman's language. I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, this is the first information I have about this bill. I did not know it had been pending; I did not know it was before the committee; but I am sure that if the provisions of this bill were generally understood, the House would not approve of it. It means, in effect, that the prohibition States which have the right to enforce their police powers within the State, will have the right to enforce them against any citizen in the country who attempts to sell to the citizens of that State any liquor whatsoever. It practically legalizes prohibition and nullifies the decision of the Supreme Court, which is to the effect that as long as these packages pertain to interstate commerce they can not be interfered with by the police powers of the State.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is exactly this bill—intending to permit the enforcement of the prohibition laws of the State in the community so that they may not be violated as they have been in the manner to which I have referred.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Exactly, and that is what I am opposed to. If a majority in any State of the Union sees fit to adopt prohibition, if 51 out of 100 vote for prohibition, to deprive the 49 of their personal liberty and their individual rights, then I say that under the laws of the country those 49 ought to have the privilege of exercising their personal liberty and of purchasing what they require anywhere else.

Under this bill, Mr. Speaker, they will be prevented from doing so. It means absolute prohibition for every citizen living in a prohibition State, whether he believes in that principle or not. Of course it may be argued, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] makes the point, that the police power of the State may not be invoked, but what guaranty has Congress to that effect? If we leave this entirely to the States, then we yield and sacrifice a constitutional right which ought to be exercised here to protect interstate commerce.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if this is not an attempt, by Federal law, to aid prohibition throughout the United States and enforce prohibition in every part of it?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is my understanding of it. I readily admit that I may be mistaken. This is the first time that I have heard of the bill. I have not read even the report, but the provisions of the bill are plain enough to satisfy me that it means a general extension of the principles of prohibition all over this Union, and I am not prepared to vote on a matter of such importance upon so short a notice. I think the House ought to have time to consider this subject more fully rather than to have it brought in here under a rule when 10 or 12 or 15 bills are considered within thirty or forty minutes. I want time to discuss this matter and to study it, and I trust my friend from Wisconsin will not press his bill at this time.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has not been as alert as he usually is when questions of this kind are ripe for consideration. This bill was introduced the 30th day of last June. It has been before this House now for more than six months. There have been five months of leisure for the gentleman, and yet he has given it no consideration at all. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it has been before his attention for a much longer period. It was originally enacted on the 8th day of August, 1890. This bill is substantially the act of 1890, with the addition that in the first section we have inserted the words:

Before and after delivery.

There is no difference between the first section of this bill and the present statute except the introduction of those words.

The original bill made intoxicating liquors introduced into a State subject to the law of the State upon "arrival" within the boundaries of the State. Now, the Supreme Court elected to construe that to mean after the delivery of the liquors within the boundaries of the State. After the delivery the State lost sight of the liquors and practically lost jurisdiction over them. The State authorities could do nothing in the way of the enforcement of the law, and therefore they have sought this legislation, giving the State jurisdiction either before or after delivery after arrival within the limits of the State. And why should not this be so? Why should not the State of Missouri have jurisdiction over the importation of liquors within that State and designed for use in that State?

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KLEBERG. I ask it for information. Will not this bill give the State authorities the power to destroy absolutely any liquor that comes within the State of Iowa?

Mr. HEPBURN. No. It will give the State of Iowa the power to destroy liquors when brought within the State if they are there in opposition to the provisions of the law of that State.

Mr. KLEBERG. That is what I asked.

Mr. HEPBURN. It prevents the importer from avoiding the statutes of Iowa because of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution and the legislation thereunder.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will not that prevent the introduction of liquor by any private individual?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not, unless it is brought there for some illegal purpose. It is not illegal for the gentleman to carry liquors into the State of Iowa for his own consumption.

Mr. KLEBERG. That is what I question.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, it is not. There is no statute of that kind. It is the illegal sale of the liquor that our statute has been enacted to prohibit.

Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is but very little in this to excite my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]. I know he is easily excited upon subjects of this kind; but we simply want to exercise our power over liquors imported into the States, the power that we would have the right to exercise but for the original-package clause of the Federal law; that is all.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I understand all that——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] has the floor.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to say just one word more, and that is that I for one am willing to go to the full extent of our constitutional authority to aid the States in the enforcement of all their police regulations, their laws and regulations that affect public health and morals.

When this question, or questions similar to this, came before the House in a former Congress, I recollect that the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] offered a proposition—I think it was brought forward on the floor of the House, and I know that he offered it to the Congress—that wherever the States had laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, a license to sell intoxicating liquors should not be granted by the United States. Now, in the State of Iowa, under the law as it exists, these soliciting agents can take out a Federal license to sell liquors and defy the laws of the State and the public sentiment of any community.

Now, gentlemen, this is simply a proposition to give to the States the right of local self-government, the right of the majority in any community to make their own laws and to enforce them. The fact that perchance the enforcement of the law that the people of a community have deemed best to their health and happiness should affect some little beer industry or big beer industry in St. Louis or elsewhere is no reason why we should vote down this proposition.

Inasmuch as it has come from the committee with a unanimous report and is in aid of home rule, is in favor of States' rights, is in behalf of the moral sentiment of the people of Iowa and of other States, I maintain that every reason, legal, political, and moral, constrains us to vote for this bill. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want merely two or three minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, in immediate reply to my friend from Alabama, I would like to ask every reasonable man on this floor how much business a soliciting agent such as he refers to can do in a prohibition community if the sentiment on that question is unanimous?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would ask the gentleman how much business a "blind tiger" can do in a community? And this is worse than a "blind tiger."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Why is it possible for liquors to go there if there is a unanimous sentiment against it? Is it possible that some people may stand on the street corners and preach prohibition and then give orders to the soliciting agent to supply them with liquor?

Mr. CLAYTON. There are laws against murder and other crimes, but they are committed.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I say, is it possible that such hypocrisy is possible in any community? I now believe, according to the argument made by friend, that it must be possible. There must be such hypocrisy, or else these soliciting agents could not exist and a "blind tiger" could not exist. But I was going to ask my friend from Iowa a question, and it is this: Is there in this bill a provision which will permit a citizen of Iowa or a citizen of any other prohibition State to order, for his own table and his own private use, such drinkables as he or his family may require as civilized individuals?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is certainly no provision that he may not do that, and no law of the State of Iowa that would prohibit him from doing that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If my friend will pardon me, if this bill passes and the police regulations of the State of Iowa and the laws of the State of Iowa are strictly enforced, then, I say, they can not get goods of that kind. In other words, if these original packages sent from other States are stopped at the boundary of the State, how will it be possible for my friend or any other person there to secure any of that kind of stuff?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think any question of that kind could possibly arise. There will be no constabulary on the border line of the State of Iowa. The only change between this bill, the gentleman will understand, and the present law, is the insertion of these words, "before or after delivery." That is all. The Supreme Court have held that the law does not apply until "after delivery," under the present statute. Now, we have tried to remedy that. Whenever liquor is sent, for example, to my town—sometimes 30, 40, or 50 packages come from the gentleman's town—his constituents persist in selling liquor there. We want to prevent that. We have enacted a law therein that we thought was sufficient. The Supreme Court have taken the substance out of it by this decision that I have called to his attention. I want to say further, that when the gentleman talked a little while ago about hypocrisy, I do not think there is any hyprocrisy in the matter at all. We have some gentlemen who like and will have liquor, and who become harmful to the State——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is that in Iowa?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is in Iowa, and in Ohio, and practically every other State.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I admit it.

Mr. HEPBURN. So I say there is no hypocrisy about that, and we are trying to control this class of our people that will get liquor through the connivance of the gentleman's constituents and then harm the body politic, commit murders, and other crimes, and almost the only ones we have in the State, under the influence of these sales. We are trying to prohibit it, and want the gentleman to help us to do it.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the gentleman from Missouri misconceives the purpose of this bill. The law as it now stands authorizes the States to prohibit, control, or regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors transported from one State into another while such liquors remain in the original packages. That far the Wilson bill goes as it stands on the statute books to-day. But, as has already been stated, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, the effect of that act has been limited somewhat beyond expectation. Under these decisions intoxicating liquors retain the character of articles of interstate commerce until they go into the hands of the consignee. The only purpose of this bill is to extend that law and subject intoxicating liquors imported into a State to the jurisdiction of State law as soon as it crosses the State line. It is not a measure in favor of or against prohibition; it does not propose to deal with the question, but to leave the whole question of controlling the liquor traffic with the several States.

It is a measure intended to give to the States the right and power to control the sale of intoxicating liquors within their own borders. It is the purpose of this bill to place the citizens of any State in like position with the citizens of every other State with respect to the sale of intoxicating liquors—to place the citizens of Iowa in like position with citizens of Illinois and Missouri, when the citizens of these States send their liquors into Iowa for sale or consumption there. Under this bill, if it shall become a law, the citizens of any State importing intoxicating liquors into another State will have the same rights and privileges respecting such liquors in the State in which they are received as the citizens of that State will have respecting liquors produced therein. The citizens of Illinois or Missouri who intend or attempt to go into the State of Iowa and there sell their products will have the same rights and privileges as the citizens of Iowa have respecting any liquors sold or produced in that State. It places the citizens of all the States on precisely the same ground. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reason why, through the protection of interstate commerce, the States should be divested of the power to control the traffic in intoxicating liquors within their own borders as a police regulation for the protection and welfare of their own people. By the adoption of this measure we do not say that you shall not ship your liquors into any State, nor that you shall not sell them therein; but we only say by this bill that the State shall determine that question. If any State desires to enforce prohibition, then we say let that State enforce its prohibition against the citizens of other States and those who may attempt to import their liquors into that State, as well as against the citizen of its own State and those who may attempt to sell liquors owned or produced in such State.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. In such a case there could be no delivery. For instance, in the State of Iowa, if you have prohibition there, there could be no delivery.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. How would the law apply?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. The law would simply bring the liquors—when shipped over the line into Iowa, from Michigan, for instance—bring them under the control of the laws of the State as soon as they crossed the line.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Then it is a waiver of the general power of interstate commerce?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Yes, so far as to yield the authority to the State to control or prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will it affect liquors transported across the State from one State into another?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is there anything in the bill to preserve the right of such transportation?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is specially preserved.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will it affect the use of liquor on dining cars on trains running through the State?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I apprehend that the same rule will apply in the sale of intoxicating liquor on dining cars that will apply anywhere else—that would apply to an eating house.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman from Indiana does not seem to know that in some States they are prohibited now from selling liquor on dining cars.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. This, Mr. Speaker, as I have outlined, is the purpose of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in the case of Leisey against Hardin the Supreme Court of the United States held that under the interstate-commerce clause of the Federal Constitution one had a right to ship liquor into a State in original packages and there sell it in unbroken packages. Immediately after the decision was handed down Congress passed the Wilson bill, which provided that upon the arrival of liquors in a State they should be subject to the police regulations thereof. The United States Supreme Court, in the Rhodes case, held that "arrival" meant delivery to the consignee. Under this holding a practice has grown up in Iowa by which a nonresident ships a large number of jugs into the State addressed to himself, and then his soliciting agent goes about selling these liquors at retail in the town, and simply transfers the bills of lading, thus carrying on the retail liquor business in that dry town in violation of the will of the majority of the people, and using the express office as a retail liquor place.

So flagrant has this become in Iowa that in one of the towns in Colonel HEPBURN'S own county, when I had the honor of presiding upon the bench in that district, as high as 100 jugs at a time were found in a single express office, addressed by the consignor to himself as consignee, without any intention that they should ever be delivered, except to the several assignees of the bills of lading that might be found after the arrival of the goods in the State.

Under the decision in the Rhodes case these liquors were not subject to seizure and could be kept there in large quantities in the office of the express company, and retailed from there to whom ever would pay the C. O. D. charges, the value of the liquor and the cost of transportation. This system has been so flagrantly conducted that the State supreme court, during the last session, ordered a writ of injunction to issue against one of the express companies, enjoining it from maintaining one of its offices as a place wherein to carry on the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

So flagrant has it become that the Iowa supreme court recently ordered the destruction of a large number of boxes containing liquor found in the office of the American Express Company, upon the theory that where they were sent C. O. D. in this way they were not sold until delivered, and therefore not within the protection of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution.

So flagrant has this been in Iowa that at the last session of the United States district court for the southern district the Adams Express Company was formally indicted by the grand jury for being engaged in the retail liquor business without having paid the special tax therefor, as required by the laws of the United States.

Now, if we do not want this traffic carried on we ought to have the right to prevent a nonresident Iowan living in Brother BARTHOLDT'S district sending liquor to himself in a dry town, insisting that under the decision in the Rhodes case they are entitled to immunity from seizure until they are delivered to the consignee when he does not intend to receive them, and retailing these liquors to whoever will come up and advance the value of the liquor and the cost of transportation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. How can he find purchasers if they do not want it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There are people even in Iowa who, like my friend from Missouri, demand intoxicating liquors. But we say that the majority of the people in a community have the right to say whether this traffic shall be conducted there or not; and this bill proposes simply to give back to us that power of local self-government which we had enjoyed until the decision in the Rhodes case that the word "arrival" under the Wilson law meant delivery to the consignee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In other words, my friend would not allow a private citizen to order——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] yield further?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I can not agree with my friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] in supporting this bill. I think that it is "on all fours" with the oleomargarine bill, which he and other Democrats, including myself, fought on this floor. I think that this bill is an unwarranted interference with interstate commerce. If it can be said by Congress that liquor shall not be imported from one State to another, it can equally be said by Congress that any other article of commerce can be prevented from going from one State into another. I repeat, this is the same fight that we had on the oleomargarine bill; and the reason against this bill is one of the principal reasons that the Democrats had for opposing that bill.

Mr. Speaker, after all, this whole question is nothing but a prohibition question, transferred from the State of Iowa to the Congress of the United States. This bill is simply an attempt by Federal legislation to aid the principle of prohibition; and my friends on the other side and on this side might just as well so recognize it. Now, I am an antiprohibitionist. I believe in personal liberty, and for that reason I shall cast my vote against this bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. JENKINS. How many minutes does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman that I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. If the gentleman wants some time I will give it to him.

Mr. BARTLETT. Only a few minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I suppose the Chair means "the gentleman from Georgia" [Mr. BARTLETT].

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair begs pardon for the mistake.

Mr. BARTLETT. Georgia had the honor of giving the State of Alabama to the Union; and hence it is no offense to me to be designated as coming from Alabama. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. And Alabama loves her mother State.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill ought to pass. I am as much opposed to prohibition as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] who has just taken his seat. Were it a question in a locality whether prohibition should be established. I should vote against it, because I believe that in a community such as I live in—in the large cities of this country and elsewhere—an attempt to enforce prohibition has always ended in a great farce. But this is not a prohibition bill. It is a bill providing simply that the States that have enacted laws upon the subject of the sale of liquor—that have enacted laws, it may be, for the purpose of preventing the sale of liquor, or for the purpose of regulating the sale of liquor, or for the purpose of licensing the sale of liquor—have a right to say under the Constitution whether those laws shall be defeated and destroyed by means of the use of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, which the Supreme Court has decided in the Rhodes case may be used for that purpose.

Now, it is a well-known fact that in the State of Maine, which has had a prohibition law ingrafted in her constitution for fifty years, and all over the country, in every State where prohibition laws exist, those who desire to violate those laws simply procure a United States license from the internal-revenue collector, and set up their business and defy the laws of the States. This bill, as I understand, simply transfers to the State legislatures and the State local authorities the right which I believe they have always had since the organization of this Government—the right which the States reserved to themselves when they entered into the compact of States—the right to govern their own local affairs and the right to pass and have enforced police laws as the people of those States desire that they should be enforced. This is all I desire to say about the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. I call for the previous question on the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment to the title as proposed by the committee will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLERKS OF CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 14047) and I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by its title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14047) for the relief of the clerks of circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask that the whole bill be reported, pending the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to reopen and restate the emolument accounts of the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the years 1891 to 1900, inclusive, where a balance against said clerks has been created contrary to the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury dated July 29, 1901, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States cited therein, and to settle the same in accordance with said decisions; and upon satisfactory proof, which shall be made under oath, of any balance due any of said clerks, to certify and pay such balance to them out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE IN EIGHTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (S. 5316) providing for an additional associate judge in the eighth judicial circuit, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill which the Clerk will report may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the eighth circuit an additional circuit judge, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall possess the qualifications, and shall have the powers and jurisdiction and receive the compensation as prescribed by law in respect to other circuit judges.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE IN DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (S. 6461) providing for an additional circuit judge in the district of Minnesota, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill which the Clerk will report may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the district of Minnesota an additional district judge, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall possess the same qualifications and have the same power and jurisdiction now prescribed by law in respect to the present district judge therein.

SEC. 2. That the senior circuit judge of the eighth circuit, or the resident circuit judge within the district, shall make all necessary orders for the division of business and the assignment of cases for trial in said district.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the 1st day of July, 1903.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE OF DISTRICT COURT FOR SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 16724) providing for an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill, which the Clerk will report, may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, who shall reside in said district, and who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same salary as the present district judge of said district.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 2 and make section 3 section 2.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JENKINS. I would like to know the purpose for which the gentleman rises.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For the purpose of moving to reinsert section 2.

Mr. JENKINS. That question, I would say to the gentleman from New York, will come up on considering the committee amendment. When the committee amendment is submitted to the House the question to which the gentleman refers will be up for consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that, consent being given to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, unless the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from New York the gentleman from New York will be precluded from making his motion.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] perhaps does not understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] is not in sympathy with the committee amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, I take it the gentleman from Wisconsin intends to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from New York will have every opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear what the gentleman from Alabama had to say in reference to the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I only said that if the bill is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole the gentleman from New York might be cut out of his opportunity to make his motion unless the gentleman from Wisconsin yielded; and the gentleman from Wisconsin has yielded to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the additional judgeship for which the bill before the House provides is greatly needed in the southern district of New York. The judicial labors of the district court there have become so great as to overtax the fair working capacity of any single judge, and a due regard for the proper dispatch of business and for that careful attention and thoughtful deliberation we all expect shall be exercised in the performance of the judicial functions, requires that in the southern district of my State there should be at least one more judges.

The bar there is unanimous in its opinion that the business of the court absolutely requires an additional judge, and though the district judge who now presides there has striven to cope with the enormous and constantly growing volume of work in this exceedingly busy judicial district, it has become apparent that, however diligent and energetic he has been, he can not continue to perform the arduous labors of that tribunal so as to keep satisfactorily abreast with the litigation without an increase in the judicial force of the court. I take it, therefore, that no opposition will be offered to the bill. But the committee in reporting the measure has recommended that section 2 be stricken out. I trust that section will be retained. It in substance provides that—

The arrangement of the business of the court shall be directed by the judge senior in office, except in case of his disability, to be determined by the circuit court of appeals for the second circuit, when the junior judge shall have the power.

There ought to be a recognized head of the court, and to avoid the possibility of disagreement there ought to be some such provision as is contained in section 2. It will operate as a safeguard against friction and tend to the better regulation of the transaction of the court's business. It seems to me, as it seems to the bar of New York, that the arrangement for the business of the court with but two judges may be safely, and, in fact, ought properly to be, left to the judge who is senior in office.

We can readily understand that where there are but two judges there ought to be some one who, in case necessity therefor arises, could direct the arrangement of business. It is to meet a possible necessity, to insure harmonious action, to avoid misunderstandings, and guard against disagreement that section 2 ought to be retained, although I do wish to say that there is very little probability that so long as our present district judge, Judge Adams, continues in office there will be any cause for any incoming judge to disagree with him.

A very learned and distinguished jurist, an exceedingly able man, a man of remarkable business capacity, and an indefatigable worker, who has discharged his duties to the satisfaction of the entire bar of New York, Judge Adams will certainly do nothing at any time to impede or retard the business of the court, but rather will help, as he has always done, to expedite the work. Judge Adams is a genial gentleman, who, I am sure, will get along exceedingly well with anyone who may be appointed under this bill, but in legislating we ought to guard against the possibilities that can be foreseen and avoid what so easily and without any impropriety may be guarded against. The reasons for the insertion of the section which the committee proposes shall be stricken out are, I hope, obvious, and, without detaining the House longer, I suggest to the committee reporting the bill the advisability of reinserting section 2 as it appears in the original bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say to the gentleman from New York and to the House that this amendment was very carefully considered by the Judiciary Committee, and they were unanimously opposed to the views of the gentleman from New York. There is no judge elsewhere in the United States who is of equal rank, who is subject to the orders of his brethren. Now, the gentleman from New York insists that on account of the fact that there are two or more district judges in this district, the senior judge should direct the others as to what they shall do and when they shall do it. The Judiciary Committee were opposed to it. Each judge stands on an equal footing. They are all of one rank and it would be unfair to say by law that the senior judge should compel the others to do work in accordance with his views. Therefore the committee recommended that that provision of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Suppose there should be a disagreement between the two judges, who shall settle the question as to the arrangement of the business of the court?

Mr. JENKINS. There can not be. The same rule must prevail that prevails in other places where there are more district judges than one.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Wisconsin will readily understand that if there were three judges, the question would be easy of solution; but where there are two judges, ought not the senior judge, especially when he has so well conducted the business of the court during the time that he has been in office, be permitted, in case of disagreement between the two judges, to arrange the business of the court?

Mr. JENKINS. I ask for a vote on the committee amendment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is that the amendment I refer to?

The SPEAKER. That is the only amendment pending.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, were read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him before he calls up another bill? I move that House bill 15512, identical with the bill just passed, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman from Alabama moves to lay the House bill identical with that already passed on the table. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

SALARIES OF CERTAIN JUDGES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 3287.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States.

Mr. JENKINS. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the House is proceeding under a rule giving this day to the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is right.

Mr. MOON. Does the Speaker construe that rule to mean that the committee may take bills from either of the Calendars of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the construction.

Mr. MOON. Then I have no objection to the matter proceeding according to the request of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to considering the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. This is an important bill, and I think the gentleman from Wisconsin should allow the same latitude of debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee objected?

Mr. MOON. I made the inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining the exact ruling of the Chair. I construed the rule myself as the Chair has construed it. I have no objection to the House proceeding to the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, then, the bill will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand some gentlemen on our side may desire to offer amendments, and I hope an opportunity will be afforded.

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

(16) Strike out the word "judges," in line 18, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Chief Justice and to the associate justices."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the subcommittee that considered this bill. Not only had I the opportunity to consider such information as was brought to the attention of the subcommittee when the bill was pending before it, but I also had the additional opportunity of considering it in the full Committee on the Judiciary, and I am of the deliberate opinion that the bill ought not to pass. Being thus convinced, I feel that it is incumbent upon me to give to this House the reasons that have induced this conviction upon my part. The committee recommending the passage of this bill, in their report, assign as reasons therefor that the amount of work now required of the various judges embraced by its terms has greatly increased, that the cost of living has been largely enhanced, and that they can not practice their profession. Now, these are the three reasons stated in this report as to why this bill should pass.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if the work required to be done by these judges has grown to be so great that they can not by reasonable energy and diligence perform it, that condition can be met only by an increase in the number of judges, and not by an increase of salaries. As to the second reason, I am quite sure that the necessary cost of living has not only not increased over what it was when these salaries were fixed, but is absolutely less to-day than it was then. As to the third reason, that they can not practice their profession, I may say that it is without merit in this connection, since none of them ever sought to do so at any time after their induction into office. This reason, therefore, is no more cogent now than when the existing laws fixing their salaries were enacted, and so far as that sacrifice ought to enter into the matter of determining the size of the salaries it is compensated in the sums now paid.

Mr. GILBERT. All three of these reasons apply to members of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, and to many other officials, so far as that is concerned. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States was organized under the act of September 24, 1789, which provided for a Chief Justice and 5 associate justices. By the act of April 29, 1802, the number of associate justices was increased to 6. By the act of March 3, 1837, the number of associate justices was increased to 8. By the act of March 3, 1863, the number of associate justices was placed at 9. By the act of July 23, 1866, the number of associates was reduced to 6, and by the act of April 10, 1869, the number was increased to 8. So that we have to-day upon the Supreme Bench of the United States 3 more associate justices than we had when the court was organized under the act of September 24, 1789.

Now, let me invite your attention to the increase of the salaries of these judges. By the act of September 23, 1789, the salary of the Chief Justice was fixed at $4,000, and that of each associate justice at $3,500. These continued to be the salaries of these positions, respectively, until February 20, 1819, when the salary of the Chief Justice was increased to $5,000 and each associate justice to $4,000. This continued to be the scale of salaries for them until the act of March 3, 1855, which allowed the Chief Justice $6,500 and each associate justice $6,000.

This scale of salaries was in force until March 3, 1871, when by an act of Congress the salary of the Chief Justice was fixed at $8,500 and that of each associate justice at $8,000; so that as late as 1871 the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court was paid $8,500 and each associate justice $8,000.

This brings us in regular order to the last act regulating the salaries of these officials, which was and is yet known as the salary-grab act of 1873, which increased the salaries of hundreds of officials, and among them that of the Chief Justice to $10,500 and that of each associate justice to $10,000.

And at this point I desire to call to your attention the fact that Congress, by an act of January 20, 1874, in response to the demands of the indignant people of the United States, repealed the salary-grab act as to every official to which it applied, save and except the President and justices of the Supreme Court. Of these unjust additions to each in the long list of salaries covered by that ill-advised and disreputable act those of the President and justices of the Supreme Court only escaped the trenchant scepter of prompt repeal.

Take the Secretary of each Department of the Government—the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, whose salaries were increased to $10,000 by that act—all of them were reduced to $8,000 by the act of January, 1874. So that you have not only had an increase in the membership of this bench since its organization, but you have seen the salary of the supreme justices go from $6,500 for the Chief Justice and $6,000 each for associate justice, in 1867, up to $10,500 for the Chief Justice and $10,000 for each associate justice now.

I now invite your attention to the circuit courts, circuit judges, and their salaries. The first circuit courts of the United States were established by the same act that authorized the Supreme Court of the United States in 1789. There were three circuits made at that time, and the circuit courts were held by two justices of the Supreme Court and the district judge in the district in which the circuit court was to be held. By the act of July 23, 1866, nine circuits were established, and there has been no change in the number since then. By the act of April 10, 1869, the appointment of nine circuit judges was authorized, at a salary of $5,000 each. Nine circuit judges—bear these figures in mind—nine circuit judges were authorized, at a salary of $5,000 each. By the act of March 3, 1871, the salaries of the circuit judges was increased to $6,000 each.

Now, what has happened? You say the work of these judges has greatly increased. I respond that there were no distinctively circuit judges until 1869, when 9 were authorized at $5,000 each per annum, and their salaries were increased two years later to $6,000 each. Since then the number of these judges has been increased to 26, lacking but one of trebling the number authorized thirty-three years ago. If, as contended, the work of these courts has grown in volume, I hazard nothing in asserting that it has been fully provided for from time to time by giving additional judges, the only true remedy for overworked judges. I answer further, that you have not only trebled the number of judges, but you have enlarged the sum paid for circuit judges $111,000 per annum since 1869.

Next consider the matter of district judges. By the same act that organized the Supreme Court of the United States in 1789 the United States was divided into 13 judicial districts, with one judge in each. The district and salary of each judge was as follows, viz: Maine, 1 judge, who received $1,000 per annum; New Hampshire, 1 judge, who received $1,000 per annum; Massachusetts, 1 judge, who received $1,200 per annum; Connecticut, 1 judge, who received $1,000 per annum; New York, 1 judge, who received $1,500 per annum; New Jersey, 1 judge, who received $1,000 per annum; Pennsylvania, 1 judge, who received $1,600 per annum; Delaware, 1 judge, who received $800 per annum; Maryland, 1 judge, who received $1,500 per annum; Virginia, 1 judge, who received $1,800 per annum; Kentucky, 1 judge, who received $1,000 per annum; Georgia, 1 judge, who received $1,500 per annum; South Carolina, 1 judge, who received $1,800 per annum.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman state the jurisdiction and work of those judges of whom the gentleman has just been speaking, receiving salaries as low as $1,000 a year?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. They were the United States district judges under the act organizing the judicial system of the United States.

Mr. JENKINS. That was nearly a hundred years ago?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. So I understand; but there were only 13 district judges, 6 Supreme Court justices, and no circuit judges then.

Mr. JENKINS. But to-day some of those judges have more business to deal with than there was in the whole United States at that time.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Then let us examine some figures of more recent date. As late as 1867, when there were no circuit judges, there were 46 United States district judges, receiving generally salaries of $3,500 each. In California the district judge received $5,000; in Louisiana the district judge received $4,500; in Maryland the district judge received $4,000; in Massachusetts the district judge received $4,000; in Illinois one district judge received $4,000, the other $3,500; in New York there were three district judges, receiving $4,000 each; and in Pennsylvania there were two district judges, receiving each $4,000. In Ohio there was one receiving $3,500, and one receiving $4,000. With those exceptions, every one of the 46 district judges in the United States received in 1867 only $3,500 per annum.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is not the gentleman aware that since the passage of the bankruptcy law an immense amount of business has been imposed upon these district judges? In one district alone in New York 2,200 bankruptcy cases were filed within a year and a half after the passage of that act.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In answer to that suggestion, I beg to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that while we have a bankruptcy law which has to some extent increased the work of these judges, we also had a bankruptcy law and an immense volume of litigation resulting from the civil war and reconstruction in 1870, when we had but 46 of these judges, and no circuit judges whatever.

Mr. GRAHAM. But there was nothing like the business then that has been brought into these courts under the bankruptcy act.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If the gentleman will take up the records of this country, I am sure he will discover quite a different state of things from that which he indicates.

Mr. GRAHAM. Can the gentleman point to 2,200 cases in one district under the law of 1867?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have not the records before me, but I assume and believe that the business under the old bankruptcy law bears a fair proportion, at least, to the business under the present bankruptcy law. You had then but 46 district judges and no circuit judges. Those district judges, as I have said, received but $3,500 as a general rule in that day, and that continued to be the salary of these judges until 1891, with the exceptions that I have noted.

On the 1st of September last there were 72 district judges in the United States, or 26 more than there were in 1867, so that there are to-day 52 more circuit and district judges than in 1867, more than 100 per cent increase.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. With pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. One of the very latest district judgeships that has been provided for by Congress was, I believe, for the gentleman's State of Kentucky.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is true.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did the gentleman at the time that judgeship was authorized show a lack of necessity for that additional judge?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; because it was needed, and my action then was and is in line with my argument now in opposition to the position of the committee holding that the pay of these judges should be increased because the work has increased. I say that the true remedy for the increase of business, the true way to meet this exigency, if any exist, which I deny, is by an increase in the number of judges, not an increase of salary. [Applause.] That is my theory about such condition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not only has the number of district judges been enlarged more than 56 per cent since 1867, but by the act of 1891 their salaries were fixed at the uniform rate of $5,000 per annum in lieu of those allowed by the act of March 3, 1867, and stated by me a few moments ago.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if he does not think that the number of these judges could be further decreased by confining these courts within their constitutional jurisdiction and keeping them from usurping the rights of the State courts?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am aware that there is a divergency of views upon that question, and it is not a part of my purpose to-day to discuss that phase of the matter. I am endeavoring, in my humble way, to give to the members of this House the reasons that cause me to oppose this measure. Now, let us see somewhat further. This bill includes also the judges of the District of Columbia.

By an act of Congress of March 3, 1863, there was established for the District of Columbia what is known as the supreme court of the District. The act provided that it should have four justices, one of whom was to be the chief justice. The court was given original and appellate jurisdiction. The four judges of the court received salaries of $3,000 per annum each, or a total of $12,000 per annum for the judges of the supreme court with its original and appellate jurisdiction in the District of Columbia in 1863. Is is really interesting to note how that court has progressed, if not in all respects, at least in adding to its membership and salaries and limiting its jurisdiction. By the act of June 1, 1866, the salaries of these judges were increased to $4,500 per annum for the chief justice and $4,000 per annum for each associate justice. By the act of February 9, 1893, their salaries were increased to $5,000 per annum.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KLEBERG. I notice here that the chief justice of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia gets only $6,000——

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will get to that.

Mr. KLEBERG. I want to know the reason for the discrimination. It seems that those are the only judges who are not benefited by the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will get to that in its order. Now, as I said, Mr. Speaker, in 1863 the salaries of these District of Columbia judges were fixed at $3,000, increased to $4,000 in 1866 and to $5,000 in 1893. In the meantime Congress had, by the act of June 21, 1870, added one additional justice to that bench. By an act of February 25, 1879, Congress added a second additional justice to the supreme court bench of the District of Columbia, so that there has been an increase in the number of judges on that bench since 1863 by 50 per cent and a growth of 66 per cent in each salary. Nor are these the only changes that have occurred affecting that tribunal. By the act of February 9, 1893, Congress created in this District what is known as the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, relieving the supreme court of much of its appellate jurisdiction, which was conferred upon it by the act establishing it. So that, condensely stated, the matter stands as follows:

The supreme court of the District of Columbia, organized in 1863 with four judges with salaries of $3,000 each, and having both original and appellant jurisdiction, now, with its jurisdiction greatly diminished, has six judges receiving salaries of $5,000 each, and this bill, if enacted into law, will give the chief justice of that court $6,500 and each associate $6,000 per annum. In 1893, as I said, there was provided for this District what was and is known as the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, relieving the supreme court of its appellate jurisdiction. This bill does not provide one solitary cent increase of salary to the judges of the court of appeals, three in number—one chief justice and two associate justices. I make the assertion here and now, and I challenge the honorable chairman of the committee or any member who may be opposed to my views upon this question to show a single State in the Union in which the nisi prius judges are paid as much as the members of the supreme or the appellate bench.

Mr. JENKINS. I would ask the gentleman what that court gets now?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. By the act establishing the court the chief justice gets $6,500 and the associate justices $6,000.

Mr. JENKINS. They have had no increase since the court was organized?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. No; that was by the act of February 9, 1893, which authorized the court of appeals.

Mr. JENKINS. They have had that salary ever since the court was organized?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes, and this bill does not increase those sums by one solitary cent, but places the judges of the supreme court of the District on an equality with them so far as salary is concerned. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if there is to be any increase to any of these judicial officers, the members of the appellate bench in the District of Columbia are as justly entitled to an increase as any other judicial officers mentioned in the bill. But let us see now somewhat further how the matter stands by way of recapitulation. Let us compare the number of judges and amounts paid at present for salaries with those of 1867.

In 1867 there was a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, receiving $6,500 per annum, and six associate justices, receiving $36,000. In other words, there was paid to the members of the Supreme Court of the United States $42,500 per annum as the law stood in 1867. The Government is paying now to the Chief Justice $10,500 and to each associate justice $8,000, or a total of $90,500 now as against $42,500 in 1867. It is now proposed to make an increase of $23,000, increasing the annual charge to $113,000 per annum, as against $42,500 in 1867, a difference of $70,500, or an enhancement of more than 165 per cent in these salaries since 1867.

The Court of Claims is included in this measure. It is proposed to increase the salaries of the judges of that court from $4,500 each, as fixed by the act of February 24, 1855 (and has remained at all times since), to $6,500 for the chief justice and $6,000 for each of the four associate justices; thus instead of a total of $22,500 on this account it is intended by this bill to make it $30,500 per annum, making a net addition of $8,000 per annum.

The salaries that this bill provides for circuit judges will require the Government to pay per annum $182,000 to the 26 circuit judges of the United States, whereas it paid nothing on that account in 1867.

For the District judges the people are paying now $192,000 per annum more than was paid in 1867. If this bill passes they will have to pay $264,000 dollars per annum more than was paid at that date. In 1867 there were four judges in the District of Columbia, and their pay aggregated $16,500 per annum. Now there are nine whose annual salaries amount to $48,500, an increase of 125 per cent in number and nearly 300 per cent in the sum of their pay. Still the committee, in defiance of these facts and, as I believe, of right and propriety, advise a further allowance of $1,000 to each of the six supreme court judges.

So that the United States to-day is paying to Supreme Court justices $48,000 per annum more than in 1867; to circuit judges $156,000 per annum more than in 1867; to district judges $192,000 per annum more than in 1867; to judges for the District of Columbia $31,500 more than in 1867, a total of $427,500 annually in excess of the sum paid thirty-five years ago. Yet this bill proposes further increases amounting to $125,000 per annum.

The increase of judges within that time has been as follows, viz:

	Number of judges.		Increase.
	1867.	1902.
Supreme Court justices	7	9	2
Circuit judges		26	26
District judges	46	72	26
District of Columbia judges	4	9	5
Total	57	116	79

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said in the beginning, I believe this bill is without merit: I believe also that it is an unfair and an unjust discrimination among the public officials of the United States.

Compare the salaries of the Cabinet officers of the United States with those in this bill. By the act of March 3, 1853, the secretary at the head of each department of this Government was given a salary of $8,000 per annum. He has been compelled to live and support his family upon that compensation from that day until this, with the exception of the time the salary-grab act was operative. Gentlemen who are advocating this measure do not come with a bill saying that we should increase the salary of the Secretary of State, of the Secretary of the Treasury, and so all along the line, because the cost of living has greatly increased. Why not? Their salaries were fixed in 1853, when the cost of living was far less than it was from 1867 to 1873, and far less than it is now.

Consider the salaries of Representatives and Senators in Congress. The salaries of the members of Congress and of the Senate were fixed by the act of July 28, 1866, at $5,000 for each member and $8,000 for the Speaker of the House. Where is the advocate of this bill, who is saying to this body and to the country that the cost of living has greatly increased, that the work has greatly increased, and we should increase the salary of members of Congress? All of these salaries are great enough. They ought not to be advanced; but, sirs, if the members of Congress, if the secretaries standing at the head of the great departments of Government, holding offices thoroughly political, having multiplied social and political exactions to meet and burdens to bear that are unknown to these judges, with brief and in some instances uncertain tenures of office, can live upon the salaries that were fixed for them, respectively, back in the fifties and sixties, I do not hesitate to declare that these judges can live upon their salaries that have been increased frequently since those days.

But now, again, I want to say, in all candor, that if there is a class of United States officials whose salaries should not be increased it is the members of the judiciary. Why do I say that? They are getting good round sums already. There is not a civil officer resident within the United States, save and except the President, who draws as much as $10,000 per annum outside of these Supreme Court justices. In other words, these Supreme Court justices get the highest salaries paid to any civil officers resident within the United States, save alone the President of the great Republic.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Does not the collector of the port of New York receive $12,000? That is my impression.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, I do not remember. I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have not been able to trace them all, but so far as my investigation has gone, they are the highest paid officials under the Government.

Not only are they drawing the best salaries under the Government, but they are permitted a valuable privilege that no other civil officer within the Government has. At the age of 70, if they have served ten years upon the bench, they can retire upon full pay a privilege, I believe, that is not given to any other officer, civil or military, within the United States, because, I think, the military officials retire upon part pay and not upon full pay.

In the meantime, I maintain the proposition that these salaries are ample to afford them a reasonable competence for themselves and families while they live. I think reliable statistics will disclose the fact that the level of prices of the necessities and luxuries of life generally were higher from 1867 to 1873 than now. There can certainly be no apology for a gentleman whose income is $10,000 per annum not being able to live in good style in Washington or elsewhere. I do not for myself see why that can not be done; and not only that, but one should be able to devote enough of his salary to the purchase of insurance so as to protect his family when death shall have cut him off from his salary. So with the district and circuit judges. They are given this privilege of retiring; likewise the judges of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for just a question?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is not the gentleman aware that the increase in business, the increase in population, has also increased the burden upon our judges? It is a fact that in the county I represent in part, since 1867, that the gentleman alludes to, during that time the court of common pleas has been enlarged by two additional courts with three additional judges, six judges having been added to the court since this time, and all these judges as busy as they can be holding courts during all the available season of the year, and each one of them paid $7,000 per annum, a thousand dollars more than you will allow by this bill to the circuit judges.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored the best I could to show that the remedy for the increase of work is an increase in the number of judges and not an increase in the salaries. I do not understand by what process of reasoning the gentleman can come to the conclusion that a man can do more work when he is getting $12,500 per annum than he can when he is getting $10,000. If he is an honest man, if he is a faithful public official, he can and will do as good service at $10,000 a year as he will at $20,000. A fidelity to public duty adjustable on a financial scale is not the kind needed or desirable in the public service.

Mr. GRAHAM. How is the gentleman going to get talented men to fill such great places as the judges who are paid $7,000? And here we limit them in this bill for circuit judges and district judges to less. How is he going to get the talent and ability to fill those places?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the gentleman calls my attention to that fact. I want to answer his question by reminding him that when we paid $4,500 to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States we had such men as John Jay, John Marshall, Roger B. Taney, Morrison R. Waite; when we were paying the associate justices but $4,000 per annum we had such men as William Cushing, Robert Harrison, John Blair, William Patterson, Samuel Chase, Bushrod Washington, and a long list of men whose great learning and ability will be respected and admired through the ceaseless ages to come by the American people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM. And while they were paying these salaries, was the gentleman not aware that members of Congress were paid far less salaries than they have now, and we had such men as Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and other great men of the country? Is it a question of salary?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I am glad the gentleman agrees with my position, that it is not the salary that should induce men to assume these places. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that any man that would make the money that he gets from public office the sole incentive to accept office is unworthy to fill a position of public trust. [Loud applause.]

The people demand and should have men for public servants who are competent, honest, and patriotic; men who have an abiding purpose to promote the happiness and welfare of all their fellow-men. That is what I stand for; that is what I believe in.

I do not, and I am sure the people of the United States do not, object to fair and reasonable allowances to public servants for their labors, but extravagance and undue liberality with public funds ought not to be indulged in by officials or tolerated by the people. I have no doubt that the present compensation is ample to afford these officials a liberal sustenance for themselves and families, and the only apology, in my opinion, for this legislation is to be found in the views of some gentlemen that the dignity and honor of official station can be augmented or diminished by adding to or taking from the emoluments thereof.

I have no sympathy with this idea. I denounce it as a pernicious fallacy begotten by the evil spirit of commercialism that seems to be so universally dominant in this age. It will, in my judgment, be an evil day for this Republic when it adopts the policy of competing with the trusts and combinations in the salaries paid, and when men are only moved to aspire to public office for the sordid and selfish purpose of financial gain. The man who has no higher conception of affairs than that an office is to be sought merely because of its emoluments is unfit to perform its duties and unworthy to be trusted. [Applause.]

And now, Mr. Speaker, I have, at greater length than I intended, given the reasons that induce me to oppose this measure. I ask as an act of justice to the great masses of the people of this country, as I believe I can do without an injustice to the men themselves who fill these positions, that this House vote this bill down. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER] who reported the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, it is entirely immaterial in the decision of the questions we are considering what salaries have been paid Federal judges in the past. The question we should consider and the facts we should be influenced by are as to what the present market value of such learning and ability as should be brought to the Federal bench now is. Are we paying them more than they should be paid? Does this bill propose to pay them more than should be paid them for the learning and ability they should have in order to be appointed to or accept these positions?

When I commenced the practice of law, not so many years ago, a twenty-five-dollar fee in Illinois was very respectable. A practicing lawyer now, even in a country town in that State, is not greatly surprised at a thousand-dollar fee. Litigation has increased in the number of cases and in their importance. Larger fees are paid and expected. Lawyers can command greater salaries and make larger incomes. There is not a railroad corporation in the United States, or any other corporation of any importance, that does not pay its general solicitor or general counsel more than this bill proposes to pay to the Chief Justice of the United States.

A salary of $13,000 a year for a corporation counsel is not exorbitant, it is not above the average, and yet this bill proposes to pay to the district judges of the United States only $6,000 a year and takes away from them all compensation for traveling expenses. The truth about it is that the salaries of only three or four classes of judges are in effect increased. The salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States are increased 25 per cent. The Chief Justice's salary is increased from $10,500 to $13,000. The associate justices from $10,000 to $12,500. There is an increase.

The next increase comes to the judges of the Court of Claims. The bill proposes to increase their salaries $1,500 a year. Then it increases the salaries of the circuit judges $1,000 and the salaries of the district judges $1,000. That is all, but it takes away from the circuit judges and the district judges any compensation whatever for traveling or other expenses when they are on duty away from their homes. So, as a matter of fact, it does not increase the compensation of the circuit or the district judges.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Did I understand the gentleman to say that under the present bill everything in the way of extra charge, traveling expenses, etc., is taken from them?

Mr. WARNER. All taken from them by this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And he is not allowed the ordinary $10 a day?

Mr. WARNER. All extra compensation is taken away and the salary covers everything. The material increase in the salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, I think, is amply warranted. The salaries paid to these high officials of the United States are almost disgraceful. They are the least paid of any judiciary of any country on earth. Compare their salaries with those paid the judiciary of Great Britain.

In England the lord high chancellor is paid $50,000 a year; three lords of appeal, each $30,000 a year; the master of the rolls, $30,000 a year; five lord justices, each $25,000 a year; the lord chief justice, $40,000 a year; five chancery justices, each $25,000 a year; fourteen queen's bench justices, each $25,000 a year; probate, divorce, and admiralty justices, two of each, $25,000 a year each; judge of the court of arches, $25,000 a year.

Take it in our own country. In New York the associate justices are each paid $17,500 a year; judges of the general session, $12,000 a year. In New Jersey the chief justice gets $10,000 a year; associate justices, $9,000 a year, and the chancellor $10,000 a year. In Illinois the judges of the supreme court get $7,500 a year; in Iowa, $6,000 a year; in Pennsylvania, $8,000 a year, and the chief justice $8,500 a year.

It is contended that the Federal judges get enough as it is, because they can retire on full pay after ten years' service, upon arriving at the age of 70 years or over. I will say in reply to that, that while they are on the bench they must give up their entire time to their judicial duties, and they should receive salary enough that they may not be in danger of pecuniary want, either in the present or in the future. It would be a sad spectacle to see the widow of the Chief Justice of the United States or the widow of an associate justice of the United States compelled to earn her own living after his decease.

These justices, it is said, can retire on full pay after they have served for ten years and have arrived at the age of 70. Let me say, sir, that very few Federal judges, either on the Supreme bench or on the bench of the district or circuit courts, retire until they become mentally incapable of performing further service. They stick to their work; they remain steadfast to their duty, and they do not take advantage of the retiring statute until they find they are compelled to do so on account of the waning of their ability, and in general they live but a short time after they have retired.

How many retired judges are now living in the United States drawing their salaries? The gentleman says that no other class of people, no other officials of the United States, can retire on full pay after having performed such service. Sir, we take young men from the country and we place them at West Point or Annapolis. We educate them; we give them the best education in the world; we pay them salaries while they are obtaining this education, and then we place them in the Army or the Navy. As officers of the Navy they hold their positions, earning longevity pay, until they reach the age of 62, when, being substantially still in the prime of life, they are retired on three-quarters pay, with a longevity allowance in addition, sufficient to raise their compensation to more than their original pay; and when thus retired they can go into the active business of life if they see fit.

An officer in the Army is retired at the age of 64 on three-quarters pay, with a longevity allowance additional, making more than the statutory pay of his rank. Sir, there are many of us on this floor who have almost arrived at that age, and who think that we are still capable of engaging in business, of going out and making the fight for our livelihood. But these judges, when they retire from the bench, retire for good. It is too late for them to go into business in private life. It would have been improper for them to engage in any such business during their judicial service.

Sir, the justices of our Supreme Court are not paid enough. The amount proposed by this bill is small enough. But the poorest paid judicial officers of the Government are the judges of the Court of Claims. That is a tribunal next in importance to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was created in 1855. At that time the salary of the judges of that court was fixed at $4,000 a year. The associate justices of the Supreme Court received at that time only $4,500 a year; the judges of the Court of Claims received only $500 a year less than the associate justices of the Supreme Court. Yet the pay of the Supreme Court justices has been advanced to $10,000 a year, while that of the judges of the Court of Claims has been left just where it was.

In 1855, when the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims were fixed, Representatives and Senators received only $1,500 a year. Their pay was $8 a day during the sessions of Congress, and Congress was not in session, on an average, more than six months in a year. Since that time the pay of Senators and Representatives has been increased to $5,000 a year, while the salaries of the judges of the Court of Claims have remained at $4,500.

I repeat, with the exception of the United States Supreme Court, there is no more important court in this country than the Court of Claims. The business of that court has increased immensely. It does a great deal of work, and it saves this Government millions of dollars. It has almost unlimited jurisdiction, embracing cases of every description. It is related that on one day that court was engaged in deciding the question as to whether a statement made by Napoleon at St. Helena was competent evidence on the hearing of the French spoliation claims; the next day the court was called upon to decide whether an officer of the United States when he captured a razor-back hog in Georgia during the rebellion appropriated it to his own use or to the use of the Government of the United States, the decision of this question being required in order to determine whether the Government was liable to the loyal Georgia owner for the hog.

Again, that court spent two days in hearing and deciding a case involving only $2.50, and the very next case resulted in a judgment by that court for $700,000.

As showing something of what that court has saved for the country, I refer to a case reported in 20 Court of Claims Reports, 112, one of the Pacific railroad cases, involving a claim by the railroad company against the Government amounting to $2,910,-124.18. The Government filed a counterclaim of $4,487,807.39, and the Court of Claims rendered a judgment against the railroad company and in favor of the Government for $1,577,683.21. The court saved the Government in that one case several million dollars.

In the Carter case, coming from Savannah, the bondsmen came into this court with a claim against the Government. The Attorney-General, perhaps not realizing what might be the effect of his suggestion, suggested that he might wish to file a counterclaim and that he wished the case postponed one day. The case was postponed. The attorneys for the plaintiffs saw the trouble that they were liable to get into, and dismissed their case, and we have never heard of it since. If the Attorney-General had filed his counterclaim then and there, the plaintiffs would not have been in a position to withdraw their claim; the matter would have been settled by the court, and in all probability the court would have rendered a judgment against those bondsmen in favor of the United States for the full amount embezzled by Captain Carter at Savannah.

This court has been neglected. This bill raises the salaries of its judges to $6,000 and the salary of its chief justice to $6,500. That is small enough, but some complaint is made that we have not raised other salaries high enough—the salaries of the justices of the court of appeals in the District of Columbia. I am of opinion that we have made the salaries of the judges in the District of Columbia too high. We place the supreme court justices on the same footing and on an equality with district justices of the United States and give them $6,000.

The justices of the court of appeals now receive $6,000 and the chief justice of the court of appeals $6,500. There are only 300,000 people in the District of Columbia. There are 6 justices of the supreme court in this little district of 300,000 people, a chief justice, and 5 associate justices. This bill gives each of them $6,000. There are 2 justices of the court of appeals and 1 chief justice. Under the law, which we do not disturb or propose to disturb, we give the associate justices of the court of appeals $6,000 each and the chief justice $6,500. That, I think, is ample and sufficient, and liberal for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KLEBERG. Why is this discrimination made? Does not the bill raise the salary of every Federal judge in the United States, except the judges of the court of appeals?

Mr. WARNER. We thought the judges of the court of appeals were paid too much before. Some of the Federal justices were paid too little, and some of them werepaid almost enough. We then raised the salaries of the circuit justices of the United States. They had $6,000 and we made it $7,000, but took away the extra compensation.

Mr. KLEBERG. Do not the judges of the Supreme Court and of the court of appeals occupy higher positions?

Mr. WARNER. Relatively and technically they do; otherwise not. They have no larger jurisdiction. You can take cases from the Patent Office to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KLEBERG. Has not the business of that court increased proportionately to the general business of other judges of the Union?

Mr. WARNER. I presume it has proportionately, but you have had too many judges in the District of Columbia from the commencement down to this time. Nine judges is a large force for a community of 300,000 people and a few square miles of territory. I know there is a great pressure brought to bear here in the District of Columbia to increase the salaries of all the judges of the District of Columbia. In the bill as it came from the Senate the associate justices of the court of appeals were to receive $8,000 and the chief justice $8,500 per year. The salaries have been unequally apportioned heretofore, as will be seen when they are compared with the salaries of circuit and district justices outside of the District.

We must remember when considering the question that circuit and district justices, outside the District of Columbia, in the discharge of their duties are compelled to hold their courts at places other than their homes; that they are at considerable expense in going to and from and while remaining at those places, and that District of Columbia justices are never required to hold court outside the District of Columbia and can always be at home. I submit that the people of the United States, with dignity, can not afford to allow the salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court and the judges of the Court of Claims to remain as they are. It is stated in the report favoring the passage of this bill that the cost of living has increased.

Each one of us on this floor is a witness and a juror on that question. We know of our own knowledge whether during the last fifteen years the cost of living has increased in the city of Washington and in the United States generally. We know all about that. We know that litigation has increased. On that question, I think the gentlemen on the other side are estopped from complaining, at least those of them who may oppose this measure, because they have on that side to-day voted to make two or three additional Federal justices in the United States, and upon the ground of necessity. There was not a dissenting voice. The judges have increased and the business has increased, and it is but proper that we should give these men reasonable compensation for the learning and the ability that they should bring to their offices. They could make more in private occupations, in the practice of their professions.

Mr. MANN. I would ask the gentleman what is the extra compensation that the judges receive to-day? I refer to the judges of the circuit court.

Mr. WARNER. When they serve on the court of appeals, as I remember, they get $10 a day, and a district judge, if he is detailed on the court of appeals outside of his district, as I remember, gets $10 a day extra.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand my colleague to say that under this bill if a district judge holds court outside of his district he will be entitled to no additional compensation?

Mr. WARNER. None whatever. Here is the provision, line 14, page 2:

That after the passage of this act no payment shall be made to any of the judges mentioned in this act for expenses.

I will say that, so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to have that stricken out.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The district judges do not get anything at all now for expenses. The circuit judges do.

Mr. WARNER. Then I stand corrected.

Mr. MANN. What is the gentleman's statement?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The district judges do not get any additional pay for expenses under the present law. The circuit judges are entitled to $10 a day for expenses under the present law.

Mr. MANN. The district judges who hold court outside of their districts do get additional pay.

Mr. OVERSTREET. When they hold court outside of their districts, but not inside of them.

Mr. MANN. Does this propose to prohibit the additional compensation of district judges who hold court outside of their districts? Is it proposed to prohibit them from receiving additional compensation?

Mr. WARNER. If this were submitted to me as a judge, on first blush and without going into the authorities on the subject, I should say that it cut off all compensation other than the salary.

Mr. MANN. Then I would call my colleague's attention to this state of affairs. In our district and in our circuit in the city of Chicago there are constantly from one to three district judges from other districts holding court. It is preposterous to suppose that you will get those district judges to come there and pay their own expenses when they receive no additional compensation.

Mr. WARNER. That is absolutely true, and for that reason I most strongly favor giving the northern district of Illinois an extra circuit judge and an extra district judge.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, we want three or four district judges.

Mr. WARNER. We will take all they give us.

Mr. MANN. The fact is, we use the district judges from Wisconsin, who, in their districts, do not have a great deal of business. They help us out in the city of Chicago.

Mr. WARNER. You admit that the business is increasing, and that the judges are overworked?

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, I am prepared to show my colleague that the Federal business in the circuit and district courts in Chicago is not as great to-day as it was a year ago, was not as great a year ago as it was two years ago, and was not as great two years ago as it was ten years ago.

Mr. WARNER. It would be very interesting reading if you would furnish it.

Mr. MANN. All you need to do is to consult the reports of the Attorney-General of the United States, which I have done.

Mr. WARNER. I know that Chicago and Cook County and northern Illinois are constantly calling and begging for outside help, not only on the Federal bench but on the State bench. They call in circuit judges from the country all over the State to come and hold court for them in the State courts, and pay them $10 a day extra for doing it.

Mr. MANN. Does my colleague think any of the circuit judges outside of Chicago would come to Chicago and hold court in the State courts for nothing?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; I think they would, just to practice on you gentlemen.

Mr. MANN. No; the practice would be the other way. We would have to practice on them.

Mr. LANDIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that the court is behind in its work?

Mr. WARNER. Where?

Mr. LANDIS. In Cook County.

Mr. WARNER. I am not familiar with the condition of Cook County. The gentleman from Cook [Mr. MANN] can probably tell you.

Mr. LANDIS. Is not that true?

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the question of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANDIS. That the work of the United States circuit courts is behind.

Mr. MANN. The United States circuit court in Chicago is nearer up with its work to-day than it was a year ago, and it disposed of more suits last year than were commenced during the year.

Mr. LANDIS. In the gentleman's judgment there is no demand, then——

Mr. MANN. Why, there are four or five hundred cases pending and undisposed of in the United States circuit court in Chicago, and 2,000 cases pending and undisposed of in the United States court in New York.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be recognized for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. DRISCOLL. After hearing this debate so far, I have come to the conclusion that this is about the same old story all the way through. From path master to judge of the Supreme Court, they strive, most of them, in season and out of season, for the job. They pull all the wires within reach for the appointment. They run here and there, I say with rare exceptions, for the appointment; and they hardly get warm in their seats when they begin to apply for an increase of salary. [Applause.] Just as soon as they are in and are covered by the civil service or statute law, they think their services are not appreciated, and they are worth more than the salary paid. If I had my way, I would fix the organic law so that no man could get an increase of salary during the time for which he is appointed or elected. The salary, if increased at all, should be increased before he is appointed or before he is elected, so that he could not use his political or judicial influence in jacking up the salaries after he has got the place. I think that ought to be a part of our organic law, in order that the members of every legislative body should be protected from the social and political influences of people who have places and want to get their salaries increased.

The judges are all honorable and distinguished men. I have no criticism to offer with respect to them; but they have the places for life, and if they live to be 70 years of age they have pensions during the rest of their time. I believe in pensions for the old soldier, but not in a civil pension list; and when these men are assured of good salaries and permanent positions while they are able to work and pensions while they live, they ought to be satisfied with that, and take the rest out in honor and dignity. [Applause.] I do not believe, either, in this unfair discrimination, which will tempt judges to stay at home rather than to go away, where they are called upon to pay their own expenses. It favors the men who live in the large cities and are permanently located. I do not know that it favors those who have to travel long distances and pay their own expenses; but I am against the general proposition that as soon as a man gets a good job he shall lobby all along the line to increase the salary. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate be closed on this bill in thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that general debate on the bill be closed in thirty minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if he will yield to me five minutes of that time?

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENKINS. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

H. R. 15922. An act making appropriations for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 16604. An act making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6132) granting an increase of pension to Fannie McHarg.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 55.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 2,500 copies of the revised code of law of the District of Columbia be printed and bound, 500 copies for the use of the Senate, 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 for sale by the superintendent of documents.

Senate concurrent resolution 57.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, as it originally appeared in the report of the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, but with the addition of 50 full-page illustrations, 7,000 copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Education for Porto Rico, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Education of the United States, and 1,500 for the use of the commissioner of education for Porto Rico.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no one of the three coordinate branches of the Government that is of more importance to the masses of the people than the judiciary. From the legislative branch there is an appeal; that is to say, the laws we pass must be weighed in reference to the question whether they are in conflict with the Federal Constitution. The legislative branch itself exercises a restraining hand on the executive branch when it sees proper to do so, but the judicial branch of the Government is the tribunal of final resort, from whose decision there is no appeal. And it is of the utmost importance to the people, and especially to the common people—the plain people—that these courts should be presided over by men of the greatest ability that can be obtained from the leading lawyers of the country.

The law in the beginning was not enacted or enforced for the strong and the mighty. The rules of law and the rules of civilized society were inaugurated that the weak might be protected against the strong. And those in our Government who are charged with the duty of protecting the weak against the strong are the men who sit on the bench as judges and decide between man and man as to their liberty and property rights. Therefore I believe that in the selection of men to fill these offices we should always exercise the greatest care, and we should, as far as possible, make the position such that the best men may be obtained to fill these positions.

Now, we all know that under the salaries now paid to the Federal judiciary there are many of the most eminent lawyers at the bar who can not accept these positions, no matter how honorable they feel them to be, because they feel that they owe a duty to their families to lay up something for the future. They are living, many of them, with their families in large cities, where they can not live on the salaries paid to the Federal judiciary. Therefore, it often occurs that the services of the ablest men at the bar can not be obtained when a vacancy occurs on the Federal bench.

It is beyond question that there are numbers of eminent lawyers practicing before the Supreme Court of the United States whose earnings at the bar amount to $25,000 to $50,000 a year. These men can not afford to give up the incomes that they are earning at the bar and accept as their life work a judicial position which, if accepted, must be accepted at so great a pecuniary loss.

Now, in this day, when we hear so much about the trusts—when it is claimed that the trusts are oppressing the masses of the common people—when we hear that the great railroad corporations are constantly extending their operations and infringing on the rights of the people, is this not a time when we should provide for the selection of men of great ability to preside over our courts and determine the questions of law that come up between the trusts and the merchant; between the great railroad corporations and the common people?

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, with amendments of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 16604) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HITT, Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. DINSMORE as conferees on the part of the House.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES JUDGES.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the pending bill because I believe, taking everything into consideration, it is eminently just and fair. I know the disposition of public functionaries to beseech Congressmen for an increase of salary. But I do not believe that disposition characterizes the judiciary. I think the judiciary, Federal and State, is more poorly paid than any other class of public servants in the whole country. This comes about, probably, from the reason that when a man becomes a judge he ceases to be a politician; and the ethics of the bench preclude him from employing the usual methods employed by other public officers in seeking to bring about an increase of salary.

I had the honor at one time in my life to be a member of the court of appeals of the State of Indiana. There were five members of that court; and the clerk of the court, who had control of the records and the files, received more pay for his services than all five of the judges combined. This unjust discrepancy is not characteristic of official pay in all the States; it is not so in relation to the Federal judiciary and is no longer the case in Indiana. But, taking everything into consideration, I think the pay of the Federal judiciary is too low, compared with other salaries.

It is difficult to establish any philosophical or scientific basis for official salaries. They must be measured according to the requirements of the situation, viewed from a large standpoint. Salaries ought to be such as to command the very best talent that can be obtained. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States gets to-day a salary of $10,500—less than the salary of the General of the Army; less than the salary of the Lieutenant-General of the Army; less than the salary of the Admiral of the Navy.

I understand the distinguished warrior who occupies the chief position in the naval organization at this time gets in the neighborhood of $17,000 a year for his official services, and if not theorectially he is practically upon the retired list. The associate justices of the Supreme Court receive $10,000 each. In determining the amount of salary to be paid to judicial officers, the dignity of the position must be taken into consideration, together with the demands upon the official and his family from a social standpoint. These are important factors to be considered. Are not the demands on the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States as great socially and in every other way as are the demands upon the General or the Lieutenant-General of the Army or an Admiral of the Navy? Is not the dignity of the Chief Justice of a court we are proud to term the greatest judicial tribunal in all civilization as great, and does he not deserve as high pay, at least, as the Lieutenant-General of the Army? Circuit judges throughout the United States to-day get less pay than major-generals. District judges get less pay than brigadier-generals in the Army.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. COOMBS. The gentleman has mentioned the salaries of the circuit judges which, I believe, are now $6,000 a year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. COOMBS. There is an increase of $1,000, but considering one of the amendments in this bill, that striking out expenses, has the gentleman ever considered the question as to whether this is an actual reduction of salary so far as it pertains to the judges of the circuit courts in California and other districts of the United States?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have. I have thought about that aspect of the question, and yet I think it is a wise thing to do.

Mr. COOMBS. A wise thing to reduce the salaries when the bill proposes to increase them?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think it a wise provision, because judges are human, and if a judge could go away from home to sit as a member of the court of appeals and get $10 a day extra compensation, he may be inclined to be away as much as possible. That is the reason for the amendment, I understand.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the bar, but I look at this question from the point of view as a business man. As a business man I realize that our judges are poorly paid. I realize to-day that unless a judge of the United States court has some means outside of his salary, he is unable to keep up the position and maintain the dignity and expenses attendant upon his office. So true has this proved in my own State that in two cases the judges of the district court of the United States in my county have been compelled to resign and resume their avocation as lawyers, by which they can make more money than as judges.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman tell us how many judges of the Supreme Court, since the foundation of the Government, have resigned their office?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not speaking of the judges of the Supreme Court. If the gentleman will give attention to what I am saying, he will see that I am talking about the judges of the district and circuit courts. I claim that they are not well paid, that they will not be sufficiently paid even under this bill, for the reason that while the salary is increased $1,000 at the same time they will be compelled to pay their own expenses. The judges of the circuit court in my district are compelled to travel from three to five hundred miles, to another section of the State, and there hold court for two or three months.

Under this bill they would be compelled to pay their expenses while there, so that the increase as proposed here is very slight in the case of judges in our section. While the bill increases the salaries $1,000, they will undoubtedly have to pay from three hundred to four hundred dollars of that increase out for expenses now allowed by law. I think this is cheeseparing. I do not think it is a proper spirit in which to take up a matter of this kind. I am surprised at the arguments made by some of the gentlemen on the floor of this House. I am surprised at the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] stating that he would put this bill on a par with the raising of the salaries of clerks and other appointees of the Government; that a man no sooner came into office than he began to lobby for an increase of salary. He also stated that he believed lobbyists had been working for the passage of this bill.

I would ask the gentleman whether any members of the United States Supreme Court, or any of the United States courts, have lobbied for this bill? Have any of them written to him or to any other member favoring this bill? I can say, as far as I am concerned, that I have had no member of the courts lobby with me, nor do I believe with any other members.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I think the members of the House are very much indebted to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], whose speech I wish could have been longer, for his clear and lucid exposition of the proper position of a judge of a United States court, and especially of the Supreme Court. Such a judge ought to occupy a position which any lawyer would be willing to take. When I say any lawyer I do not mean those who look merely at money, but any lawyer of the first rank who expects to live like a gentleman in his profession.

At the beginning of the Government these judges received $3,500 and $4,000 a year. I appeal to any member of this House whether $3,500 at that time was not more than $20,000 at the present time, considered as a standard of income.

Mr. Speaker, I remember seeing quite a number of old account books of lawyers about the years 1836 to 1840, and in those account books I found such items as this: "Received $5 for retainer for suit in the Supreme Court by A. B. against C. D."

The retainer now for the same suit would be at the least $100. The scale of living has changed. Men have to live differently from the way that our forefathers did, and any man who knows anything about practice at the bar at the present time knows that for a man without a fortune laid by, who has a first rate practice and who has proved his ability at the bar, it is impossible without great sacrifice to take a place even upon the United States bench.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asked whether any Supreme Court justice had ever resigned. Yes; Benjamin Robbins Curtis, one of the first lawyers of the land, a man who did not love money, who lived plainly, who lived simply, felt compelled to resign in order to support and educate his family. From other courts many judges have resigned. There was Judge Dillon, the author of "Dillon on Corporations," a man who loved the law, who resigned from the circuit court because he only received $6,000 a year and could not afford to remain there. Judge McCrary, who was well known, and Judge Lowell, of Massachusetts, a man who, perhaps, did not resign so much for that reason——

Mr. BARTLETT. Those are circuit judges.

Mr. PARKER. Those are circuit judges. Now, I ask anyone, whether those who live with real comfort, even on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, are not men who have some independent fortune, and whether some of the judges that we know upon that bench, who have never come near us to complain, are not, perhaps, living with difficulty, without the freedom of entertainment that is befitting their high position?

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. PARKER. I have only a few minutes, but if it is a short question I will yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was going to ask the gentleman how many you ever knew to refuse the appointment to the Supreme Court bench on account of the smallness of the salary?

Mr. PARKER. I have known men to refuse to consider it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The position of judge of the Supreme Court?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to have the gentleman mention the name of one.

Mr. PARKER. There are men whose names can be given in private. Men do not like to state publicly that they can not afford to take such an honorable position.

Now, when you look at England, the great mother of our common law, she pays to her law chancellor $50,000 a year; to her master of the rolls, $30,000; to her chief justice of her supreme court, $40,000; to the associate justices of that court, $25,000. She gets the first lawyers of the land as judges in those courts. Now, it is essential to the dignity of a court in the eyes of the public that the judges should be able to live with entire independence and be known to be able to live upon their salaries. We want justice cheap to the people in the way of costs, but we do not want cheap justice. We do not want cheap law, we do not want cheap brains. You can not get brains and power and energy upon the benches of your courts unless you pay the judges reasonable salaries.

Now, this bill is only too conservative. It is carefully drawn. It raises the salary of the Supreme Court as fixed in 1873 but one-quarter. It raises the salaries appointed long ago for the circuit judges but one-sixth. It raises the salaries appointed for the district judges one-fifth. Since the beginning the business of the courts has increased enormously. The first ten years the Supreme Court docket had 20 cases a year reported. Up to 1850 it had less than 50 cases a year reported. In 1890 there were between 400 and 500 disposed of annually.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. General debate has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States the sum of $13,000 a year, and to each of the associate justices thereof the sum of $12,500 a year.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk had not reached the point where the gentleman desires to offer his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The Clerk read as follows:

To each of the circuit judges the sum of $7,500 a year.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 11 strike out the words "five hundred dollars."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois have anything to offer?

Mr. CANNON. I want to offer a formal amendment. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first submit the question on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To each of the district judges the sum of $6,250 a year.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 13, strike out the words "two hundred and fifty."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 13 the following:
"To the judge of Porto Rico, $6,000."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order against that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. JENKINS. This bill relates wholly to the salaries of judges of the courts of the United States proper, and is not extended to any Territories or insular possessions, and is not germane.

Mr. BOREING. Is not all this a change of existing law?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman. The Chair is not advised whether the judges of Porto Rico are paid out of the public Treasury.

Mr. JENKINS. The judges of Porto Rico are paid out of the public Treasury; but this bill does not extend to the Territories of the United States or any of our insular possessions. It relates exclusively to the judges of the courts of the United States proper.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman state whether it comes out of any part of the United States funds? Who appoints the judges of Porto Rico? The Chair has no information.

Mr. BOREING. The President of the United States.

Mr. JENKINS. There is no question but what the judges of Porto Rico are appointed in the same manner, by the same authority, and paid just exactly as the judges of the courts of the United States. But they are not judges of the courts of the United States. This bill is limited exclusively to judges of the courts of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from Kentucky on the point of order, if he desires.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, since these judges are appointed by the same authority and paid out of the same treasury, that the point of order is entirely technical. If I may be permitted to state, the position is filled by ex-Chief Justice Holt, of Kentucky, one of the ablest lawyers and most capable men in our State. He was appointed by President McKinley, and asked to go down to Porto Rico and take this position. He has established the courts there successfully; his duties have been onerous, his services have been faithful, and he informs me that his compensation is inadequate. If there is a necessity for an increase in the salary upon the part of the judges of the Supreme Court, and upon the part of the judges of the district and circuit courts of the United States, it extends all the more to this position. Judge Holt is capable of filling any of the positions provided for in this bill. It strikes me that the amendment is germane and its adoption eminently proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that the judges of the District of Columbia are incorporated in this bill. It seems that these Porto Ricans are appointed by the President of the United States. The provision has broadened out now from the Federal judges for the States to the judges for the District of Columbia.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have no pride of opinion so far as the point of order is concerned; but I would like to suggest to the Chair that there is a substantial difference between the judges of Porto Rico and our insular possessions and the judges of the circuit court and the supreme court of the District of Columbia. The judges of the courts of the District of Columbia are appointed for life. The judges of Porto Rico are appointed temporarily, so to speak.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not entirely satisfied, but is inclined to hold, and will so hold, that the point of order is not well taken. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 13, "The judge in Porto Rico, $6,000."

Mr. JENKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say, so far as this amendment is concerned, that no judge in Porto Rico has ever approached the committee directly or indirectly in reference to the increase of their salaries.

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. JENKINS (continuing). No department of this government has approached the Judiciary Committee that has had this bill under consideration for many, many months——

Mr. BOREING. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. JENKINS (continuing). With reference to increasing the salary of these judges.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. JENKINS. No one has appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary in this matter when it was considering this question. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MADDOX. Have any of the other judges you are providing for approached the committee?

Mr. JENKINS. No, sir. I want to say that no judge, high or low, has approached me, and I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia that there is a vast difference between the two propositions. Here is a bill introduced openly and notoriously in this House and thoroughly considered, first by a subcommittee and then by the full committee, and both of these committees consulted the proper department of Government with reference to this question and thoroughly examined the question to determine whether or not the salaries of the gentlemen named in the bill should be increased or not.

We spent not one day, but many days, considering every single detail and we heard gentlemen interested in the matter both pro and con, and I want to say to the credit of the judiciary of this country that as far as I am concerned not one of them has approached me, directly or indirectly, although I have had the pleasure of meeting many of them since the bill was introduced. The question we are talking about in this bill has been thoroughly considered. If the committee had had an opportunity to ascertain what salaries the judges in Porto Rico get, or whether they have got any complaint to make as to whether their salary is too large or too small, that would be one thing; but we have had no opportunity to consider these questions, and hence I think the House is in duty bound to vote down this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOREING].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOREING) there were 4 ayes and 73 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like the attention of the committee for a few moments. Perhaps twenty years ago or ten years ago I should not have voted for this bill. I think I would have been wrong then, and in voting for the bill now I think I am right. All gentlemen understand the organization of our Government. The executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments; the judicial is the third estate, or, as lawyers sometimes say, it has the last guess, performing a great duty in the Republic. It is not an expensive body. I had the curiosity to go to the legislative bill to find out what the salaries of the judiciary aggregate in the United States. I was surprised at the small aggregate—$700,000 a year; that is for a coordinate branch of the Government so far as the judicial salaries are concerned. And while I was looking I found that over here the Library of Congress alone, saying nothing about the housing of it, costs one-half a million of dollars a year, very largely for salaries.

Now, I am not abusing the Library of Congress, but what does this bill do? It increases by 25 per cent the salaries of the judiciary all over the United States, that branch of the Government which holds the balances even and determines what the law is and enforces it. This bill costs $170,000 a year for this whole service in addition to what it now costs, $700,000.

Somebody once said if a man doesn't want an office he can resign. Yes; that applies to members of Congress and to everybody; but after all it is easy to say it, and I have seen the time when I thought it was cheap to say it. What the country wants with a judiciary is an honest judiciary. I think it is our glory that we have got it, and what we need at this time, with our rapid development and expenditures of the Government, every year amounting in round numbers to $700,000,000, with the rapid development everywhere, on farm and in factory, on land and on sea, with new questions arising, we want the judiciary strengthened rather than weakened.

I am one of those who believe that in the enforcement of the law given by the judiciary now and in the future the Republic is to receive great protection; it is the bulwark of our civilization and preservation. So that while $10,000 is a large sum, I can find you great multitudes who think the salary I get of $5,000 is a large sum. Three thousand dollars is a large sum, and yet all of us understand that members of a court—and lawyers in one sense are members of the court—we all know that lawyers in one case sometimes will receive fees amounting to more than the judge receives during his whole lifetime. I believe that every judge of the Federal courts should not be paid an extravagant sum, but I believe that he should have enough to support him and support his family, living as an American citizen ordinarily lives and as do those with whom he meets and associates. And for one I shall take great pleasure in voting to increase this salary list of $700,000 for all of the judges in the United States courts by 25 per cent, which would amount to $175,000.

Now, one further thing. I have heard many gentlemen say here, Why not increase our own salaries—they are too little? Well, a reply could be made, that you do not have to occupy the place; that is no argument. They are too small. I am quite willing, looking to the future, on an apt bill, to vote an increase of salary to members of Congress. I believe they ought to be increased, because every gentleman here knows, while his constituents may not know, that our salary is all gone by the time the term closes, cutting the cloth as closely as we can to meet legitimate expenses. But we will meet that when we come to it. The salary of the President is $50,000, and ought to be. I trust and believe that this House will pass the bill. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the chief justice of the Court of Claims the sum of $6,125 a year, and to each of the associate justices thereof the sum of $5,625 a year.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 1, of page 2, strike out "one" and insert "five," and after the word "hundred" strike out "and twenty-five."

In line 2 strike out "associate justices" and insert "other judges."

In line 3 strike out "five thousand six hundred and twenty-five" and insert "six thousand."

The amendments were agreed to.

The next paragraph of the bill was read, as follows:

To the chief justice of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia the sum of $8,000 a year, and to each of the associate justices thereof the sum of $7,500 a year.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6, page 2, strike out "eight thousand" and insert "six thousand five hundred," and in line 8 strike out "seven thousand five hundred" and insert "six thousand."

Mr. PEARRE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 2, strike out, after the word "of," the word "six" and substitute therefor the word "seven."

The SPEAKER. This is an amendment to the amendments of the committee. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. PEARRE was rejected.

The amendments of the committee were then agreed to.

Mr. KLEBERG. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 2, after the word "of," strike out "six thousand five hundred" and insert "seven thousand;" and in line 8, on page 2, after the word "thousand," insert "five."

Mr. JENKINS. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The first part of this amendment has already been voted upon, on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, and rejected. The last part of the proposition is embraced in the amendments of the committee. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia the sum of $6,750 a year, and to each of the associate justices thereof the sum of $6,250 a year.

Mr. COWHERD. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the word "six," in line 12, and inserting "five." I will say to the chairman of the committee that I am in favor generally of this bill, but it does seem to me that it is hardly proper to put the nisi prius judges here in the District of Columbia (and there are some five or six of them, as I remember, on this bench), doing business for a small territory containing only 278,000 people, upon a level with the district judges of the United States, whose jurisdiction may extend over an entire State, and very frequently does extend over half a State, containing a million of people, and whose business far exceeds in importance and magnitude the business of these judges of the District of Columbia. It does seem to me there ought to be some distinction made in these salaries and some harmony maintained in this legislation; therefore I offer this amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. COWHERD was rejected; there being—ayes 55, noes 64.

The question being then taken, the amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That after the passage of this act no payment shall be made to any of the judges mentioned in this act for expenses.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I am as much in favor of economy as anybody, but there is such a thing (to use a homely expression) as "saving at the spigot and losing at the bung." I believe this to be a case of that kind. If I am correctly informed, the principal expense which would be cut out by the adoption of this paragraph is the expense of a judge holding court in a district other than his own; I believe that the loss to the United States Treasury by the adoption of this paragraph would be more than the gain. It is impossible to so district any State that there shall be just as much work in one district as in another.

In my own State we have three districts. One of them is a comparatively new one. The court is just fairly started and is not overburdened with work, while in two other districts there is more work than the judges can do. A short time ago the judge of the western district of Pennsylvania called in the very excellent judge from the middle district, who helped him hold a week of court. They both sat, one in one court room and one in the other, both drawing juries from the same panel. The expense of calling that judge into that district to hold that court was probably sixty or seventy dollars. Had he not gone, another term of court would have been necessary, another panel of jurors, with mileage, jury fees, etc. My colleague [Mr. GRAHAM], who lives in that district, tells me that the clerk of the court estimated that in jury fees and expenses alone the Government saved at least $1,000.

I believe that holds good everywhere. It is a loss to the Government. It is a loss to suitors. It is a delay of justice very often if a judge can not call in a judge from another court, who at the time may not be overburdened with business, to help him out when he has more than he can do, or when he is ill, as the district judge in Philadelphia now is or has recently been. No judge would feel like going out of his own district to hold court at his own expense. The law does not give him extra pay for that extra service, but he ought to be reimbursed for his actual and reasonable expenses.

The salaries paid are not large enough to warrant Federal judges in going out of their own districts at their own expense, and of course they would not go should this bill become a law with this paragraph in its present form. Some gentleman asked whether a Federal judge had ever been known to resign. I will tell him that the present able judges of both the western and eastern districts of Pennsylvania hold their present seats upon the bench by apointment to fill vacancies caused by the resignations of their immediate predecessors. The late judge from the western district now makes at the bar, I doubt not, ten times the amount of the salary he received while judge. My amendment, however, does not deal with salaries, but with expenses, and I hope that it may be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Kentucky) there were—ayes 80, noes 69.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

Insert after line 15, on page 2, the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any of the judges of United States courts to accept or receive any gifts, free transportation, or frank from any corporation or person engaged in operating any railroad, steamboat line, express or telegraph company. Any violation of this provision shall be punished by a fine not less than $100 and not exceeding $5,000."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane. This is a bill to regulate the salaries of judges of the courts of the United States, and it seems to me that it would be casting an imputation upon those honorable gentlemen to even consider this matter seriously.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Texas, if he desires to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the point of order, as I understand it, is that this amendment is not germane. It follows a section (which has been striken out) which read that after the passage of this act no payment shall be made to any of the judges mentioned in this act for expenses. That section being stricken out, the law will remain as it is at present, Mr. Speaker, and the expenses of the judges of the Federal courts will be paid as provided by existing law—per diem and traveling expenses.

We are legislating squarely on the proposition of compensation and expenses. We propose to pay these judges their salaries, mileage, and expenses and per diem, and I do not believe their mileage should be added to their salaries. If they ride on passes they pocket the amount tickets would cost. We should pay them what salary is just, and further pay their necessary expenses, and they should receive no gift or compensation from others. How can we legislate as to their expenses and mileage and then conclude we can not in the same connection require them to procure transportation with the money we give? In other words, I believe it is germane, because it has the effect upon the legislation that we are considering that the pay of these officers shall be received by them from the people, and that they shall receive nothing from anybody else.

No man can serve two masters. If they receive a certain compensation by reason of their official position and an additional amount for expenses, why is it not germane for us to say they shall not receive from anybody else anything in reference to expenses? If they receive gifts, passes, and franks, then it is a matter of favor from the corporations or persons giving them and amounts to an increase in the salaries of our judges. No man, corporation, or set of men should be allowed to increase the salary of any of our officers. It is for the purpose of relieving the judiciary from the embarrassment of refusing or receiving favors and passes from corporations that I offer this amendment. It seems to me it is clearly germane to the subject under consideration, to wit: "What salary and allowance for expenses shall our judiciary receive?"

The SPEAKER. This question is one that troubles the Chair a little, but when we consider that this bill deals not only with salaries but also with the subject of expenses, the issuing of passes, franks, and other things that keep down the expenses would seem to be germane. At all events, the Chair will overrule the point of order and admit the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. After the word "judges" I offer to amend by inserting the words "members of Congress."

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. That amendment is accepted by me.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, upon that amendment I raise the point of order that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. This is not a bill to regulate the salaries of members of Congress. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL].

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 88.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 114, answered present 11, not voting 141, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. EDDY with Mr. FOSTER of Illinois.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio with Mr. RIXEY.

Mr. LITTAUER with Mr. JETT.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RUPPERT.

Mr. ADAMS with Mr. DINSMORE.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no;" but I find I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. TAYLER. I therefore wish to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RIXEY, and he answered "present," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TIMES AND PLACES OF HOLDING COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the House that while we have a large number of bills that ought to be called up to-night, I am going to ask the House to indulge me on one small bill providing for a change of terms of court in West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 16202) fixing the times and places for holding regular terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, that bill has been considered by the Judiciary Committee and reported to the House. Since that time a Senate bill covering the same subject has come over to the House. I ask unanimous consent for the substitution of the Senate bill for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has a right to call up a Senate bill under the order.

Mr. JENKINS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 6595) fixing the times and places for holding regular terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia shall be held each year at Danville on the Tuesday after the second Monday in April and November; at Lynchburg on the Tuesday after the second Monday in March and September; at Abingdon on the Tuesday after the first Monday in May and October; at Harrisonburg on the Tuesday after the first Monday in June and December; at Charlottesville on the second Monday in January and the first Monday in July, and at Roanoke on the second Monday in February and the third Monday in June.

SEC. 2. That the marshal for the western district of Virginia shall discharge all the duties of marshal in connection with the business of said courts at Charlottesville and Roanoke.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

Chapin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
D. J. FOSTER,
CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. McCUMBER,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

The conferees on the part of the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Committee on Claims to the Senate bill No. 342, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin," respectfully submit their conference report herewith, and submit the following statement as to the effect of the adoption of said conference report:

The bill, if passed, would refer said claim to the Court of Claims to hear and determine the question of the liability of the United States for certain losses suffered by the claimants, as alleged by them, by reason of the acts of an alleged court unlawfully formed and convened by one Jonathan S. Jenkins, as United States consul and vice-commissioner for the consulate of Apia, Navigators Islands. The facts in the case were heard and determined by the Court of Claims heretofore, and findings of fact covering exhaustively the circumstances of the case, including the losses suffered by the claimants, were made by the court, but the legal liability of the United States to the claimants was not determined.

The bill as amended by the House had stricken from it the authority for the court to consider the former proceedings by the Court of Claims had in said cause and claim, and also the authority to consider as evidence in the new hearing the authority for the court to consider as evidence documents and reports of Congressional committees. The effect of the conferees' report is to authorize the considering by the court as evidence the former proceedings of the Court of Claims in said claim, and to exclude the authority formerly given in the bill as passed by the Senate for the court to consider the documents and reports of Congressional committees.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
D. J. FOSTER,
CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Conferees of the House.

PARK IMPROVEMENT PAPERS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That 200 copies of the park improvement papers be printed and bound for the use of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia.

STATUS OF PENSION LEGISLATION.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a single observation in reference to pension legislation.

I wish to say to the Senate that the Committee on Pensions has before it at the present time approximately 300 House bills, possibly a few more than that number. The committees of the other House have almost an equal number of Senate bills before them. It has been agreed between the committees of the two Houses that for the balance of this session the Senate will for the most part consider House bills and the House will reciprocate by considering Senate bills. Therefore, no further reports will be made on Senate bills in the Senate except in a few instances where bills are now under consideration by the clerical force of the Committee on Pensions.

I give this notice for the purpose of relieving the chairman of the Committee on Pensions from importunities on the part of Senators and others for reports on Senate bills. It would be impossible to pass them through both Houses of Congress should they be reported, because the chances are, and indeed it is probably a fact, that in another body there will be only one further day given for the consideration of pension legislation.

SAFETY APPLIANCES ON RAILROADS.

Mr. CARMACK submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all petitions and arguments made to it for and against extensions of time in which common carriers by railroad should comply with the act approved March 2, 1893, to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads; also copies of all orders made by the Commission in respect to said act.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if calling for copies of all petitions, which I suppose are very numerous, on that subject, and many of them precisely the same, would not be likely to make a great deal of costly and entirely superfluous printing. A similar question came up in the Senate the other day in regard to a resolution which I myself offered for petitions from some labor organizations. I contented myself there with having only one petition printed where there were a number identical in substance.

Mr. CARMACK. I should think that if a number of these petitions were identical they would not, of course, be duplicated. I will say to the Senator that I am not asking for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to intermeddle with anything he desires for his information as a Senator, but I hope the Senator will look at the resolution and see if that can not be provided against.

Mr. HALE. Let it go over for one day.

Mr. CARMACK. It does go over. I am obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for his suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

ISLE OF PINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CARMACK, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether the Government of the Republic of Cuba is exercising right of sovereignty and control over the Isle of Pines, and whether any, and if so, what, instructions have been given for the transfer of said island from the control of the authorities of the United States to those of the Republic of Cuba, and what steps, if any, have been taken to protect the interests of such citizens of the United States as have purchased property and settled in the Isle of Pines believing that it was subject to the sovereignty of the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], the chairman of the Committee on Relations with Cuba, is absent from the Chamber this morning, and I would suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the resolution go over until that Senator can be present.

Mr. CARMACK. Very well.

Mr. HALE. Retaining its place.

Mr. ALDRICH. Retaining its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the resolution may lie on the table, holding its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COURTS-MARTIAL IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. RAWLINS, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands, and what judgments rendered by them in consequence of the dispatch sent by the Secretary of War to Major-General Chaffee referred to in the memorandum of the Secretary of War for the Adjutant-General under date of April 15, 1902; also what action was taken by the President or the Secretary of War on the judgment of any court-martial so ordered, either approving or disapproving the same.

Also, that the records in full of the several following courts-martial ordered and held in the Philippine Islands be communicated, to wit:

That on Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith.
That on Maj. Edwin F. Glenn, Fifth Infantry.
That on Lieut. Edwin A. Hickman, First Cavalry.
That on Lieut. J. H. A. Day, Marine Corps.
That on Maj. L. W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps.
That on Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry.
That on Capt. James A. Ryan, Fifteenth Cavalry.
That on Lieut. —— Cooke.
That on Lieut. Julian E. Gaiyot.
That on Lieut. N. E. Cook, of the Philippine Scouts.
That on Lieut. W. S. Sinclair, battalion adjutant, Twenty-eighth Infantry.

Also, any record or reports of investigations which may be on file in the War Department relating to the case of the so-called "Father Augustine," alleged to have been put to death by Cornelius M. Brownell, formerly a captain of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, at Banate, island of Panay, province of Iloilo, in December, 1900, also any investigations made by the Department of Justice into the facts of such case, together with any legal conclusions reached thereon and reported to the War Department.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I asked yesterday that this resolution should go over that I might have an opportunity to examine it. I have examined it since. It asks for an immense mass of papers upon subjects which were very fully discussed here during the last session. I can not myself see what purpose is served by demanding these immense quantities of papers for printing. But, in any event, it seems to me that we ought first to inquire a little more carefully into what is asked and ascertain how much we want to have sent in.

Last year there was a request for the record in the case of Major Waller, and owing to the fact that the record was in the Philippine Islands, it was not received until after the adjournment of Congress. It was sent into Congress in response to that resolution at the beginning of the present session, and I laid it before the committee at, I think, their first meeting. The committee did not seem to think it desirable to print such a mass of testimony of all kinds and such a voluminous record. So it has remained in the committee unprinted. But it will give some idea of what is asked for by this resolution. The Waller record, which I hold in my hand, is 631 typewritten pages—long pages. It would make in the neighborhood of 500 pages of print, as nearly as I have been able to calculate.

The pending resolution asks for the records of ten courts-martial. It will involve the printing of probably four or five thousand pages. We do not know whether there is anything of interest or value in the records of these courts-martial. We do not know what they may contain. There is nothing set forth in regard to them except the names. The records of some of them are undoubtedly in the Philippine Islands. I do not know but that all of them may be there. The record of the court-martial of Major Glenn, which has just been concluded, must be there. The mere fact of getting the records from Manila will involve in many cases some months of delay. It seems to me that under those circumstances a drag-net resolution of this kind, asking for what will amount to thousands of printed pages of records, ought to be examined a little more carefully by the committee before it is adopted by the Senate.

I shall therefore move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Philippines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves a reference of the resolution to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, this resolution calls for the records of courts-martial in cases which are of great public importance to the people of the United States. The objection, and the only objection, urged by the Senator from Massachusetts to the adoption of the resolution is that these records are voluminous and if sent to the Senate and printed they would cover a large number of pages.

Mr. President, it occurs to me that that is not a sufficient objection to the passage of the resolution in the ordinary form. The resolution is not a drag-net resolution, but is entirely specific.

It asks for the record of the court-martial of Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith. There is much discussion throughout the country relating to the action which was taken in regard to General Smith. I have had requests for the proceedings in these cases, and I find that it is impossible to obtain them.

Another case which is mentioned in the resolution, the record of which is sought to be obtained, is that relating to the torturing to death of an American soldier in the Philippine Islands. The neighbors and friends of this soldier are naturally desirous of obtaining the exact truth as disclosed in the case, and as to the manner by which the death of the soldier was brought about. That record is called for in the resolution. That the death of the soldier occurred, that he was tortured, and that it was done under the direction of an officer in the United States Army seems not to have been disputed. The relatives and neighbors of the boy who thus came to his death are desirous of obtaining information which will enable them to have justice done in this case, if it has not already been done. The record in this case is in the War Department now. Application made there for a copy of the record has, I am informed, been denied.

Mr. ALLISON. What case is that?

Mr. RAWLINS. It is the case of Lieutenant Sinclair, as I understand it, which is embodied in this resolution. He was court-martialed on the charge that he had caused the death of an American soldier by torture.

Mr. LODGE. What application has been denied? Do I understand the Senator to say that an application has been denied?

Mr. RAWLINS. The application for a copy of the record in this case, which related to the death of this soldier, was denied at the War Department.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware that any of these records had been asked for except in the Waller case.

Mr. RAWLINS. I refer to information which was brought to my attention, which, among other things, led me to the introduction of this resolution.

Mr. LODGE. But the request has never been made of the War Department by the Senate before?

Mr. RAWLINS. I did not say that it was made by the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, it was made by a private source?

Mr. RAWLINS. I stated that it was made by persons who were neighbors and acquaintances of this soldier, who is alleged to have been tortured to death by the direction of an American officer.

Mr. LODGE. Is it usual for the Department to furnish records of courts-martial to anyone who asks for them?

Mr. RAWLINS. I do not know as to that. I suppose not. But, Mr. President, that is the reason why it is necessary that this resolution should be passed by the Senate. Every one of the cases mentioned in the resolution is a case of great public importance, concerning which the people of the United States are entitled to accurate information. The facts in relation to them occurred in the Philippine Islands. It is impossible to obtain the information through the government of the islands. As has already been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, it is impossible to get the information from the records of the War Department.

Now, I will state to the Senate what I am informed are the circumstances relating to one case where a court-martial was had and the officer involved was acquitted. Yet I am informed that the testimony in this case shows that the officer had caused the torturing to death of an American soldier without excuse or without provocation.

Another case to which reference is made in the resolution is as to the death of Father Augustine. I am advised that information as to that case has been communicated to the War Department; that this priest was tortured deliberately in cold blood, and tortured to death, with a view to obtaining funds of which he was believed to be in possession. We have been advised that the men who were guilty of this crime are in the United States, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the government of the Philippine Islands. It is important, it seems to me, for the Senate to know whether it is possible, in these possessions within the control of the United States, for a deliberate, cruel murder to be committed, and that the men who are charged with the commission of the crime upon returning to the United States can go unwhipped of justice.

Such is the condition of the law under existing circumstances, and I think Congress should know the facts so to be able to provide the remedy. Congress can not act intelligently upon these matters unless they know the facts in respect to which they ought to legislate.

Among other things sought for by this resolution is information from the War Department as to the facts in this case and as to the legal conclusions that have been reported to the War Department by the Department of Justice as to the adequacy or inadequacy of our laws to reach culprits who have been guilty of this crime.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield.

Mr. CARMACK. I was diverted for a time, and did not hear part of the remarks of the Senator. May I inquire of him to what case he is referring?

Mr. RAWLINS. The case of Father Augustine.

We ask in this resolution for the records of the court-martial of Glenn. It seems he has twice been subjected to court-martial. In the first instance he was acquitted by the court-martial, and the acquittal was disapproved by the President. In any event, we are entitled to accurate information in regard to this case. Subsequently the same officer was subjected a second time to another court-martial. Those proceedings have recently terminated. It may be that they are not yet in the possession of the War Department in this city, but if we are correctly advised in regard to this last case, it is one of great public importance to the people of the United States. In that last case our information is that Glenn has been acquitted. The charge against him was that of causing the death of prisoners of war in violation of every rule of civilized warfare. We are advised that his defense in this case was that he had executed the order of the commander in chief of our forces in the islands. That defense seems to have prevailed. Without more accurate information we can only infer that it prevailed on the ground that he had thus been ordered to execute prisoners in his custody without trial.

There is not one of these cases which are specifically mentioned here—less than a dozen of them in all—which are not cases that have been the subject of public discussion throughout the United States.

At the last session I felt justified in bringing to the attention of the Senate the facts disclosed in the investigations of the Philippines Committee of what had occurred in the islands, to the end that the wrongs which were then shown might be rectified, that the people of the United States might be advised, and that such remedial steps might be taken as would prevent in the future such conduct on the part of those representing the United States in the islands.

Mr. President, we are met at the threshold of this case with the objection that these records are too voluminous—so voluminous that we ought not to have this information; so voluminous that it will require some 2,000 pages if we put them in print; so voluminous that it will take a few hundred dollars out of the public Treasury by way of expense in order that this information of public importance may be placed within the reach of the people—an objection which is so puerile, in my judgment, so absurd, that it can not be taken as a serious objection. It is only presented, in my opinion, to hide the real objection to these disclosures, namely, that there has been such conduct on the part of some of the officers and men in the Philippine Islands that if the truth were known by the American people it would cause them to be indignant at the outrages which have been committed. One scapegoat—General Smith—we have had, and no more. Another has been charged upon the sworn testimony of eye witnesses with cold-blooded murder for the purpose of robbery within our borders who so far has gone unwhipped of justice. We ask for information at the War Department and it is refused; and now I present a resolution to the Senate in order that the people who may be interested in the enforcement of law, in the administration of justice, may have sufficient information upon which to base action, and it is said that they can not have it because it would require 2,000 pages to be printed as a document and the expenditure of a few hundred dollars out of the public Treasury.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. For information I would like the Senator to state who is charged with cold-blooded murder. That is the question.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I have seen affidavits by soldiers and officers of the United States to the effect that Father Augustine was subjected to torture until his death; that the purpose of inflicting that torture was to compel him to disclose the whereabouts of treasure of which it was claimed he had knowledge. Failing to get the information, the torture was repeated until finally his life was taken. That was done under the direction of an officer of the United States, and the charge is based upon testimony which has been taken; and affidavits from witnesses, which I have seen, disclose these facts. And, Mr. President, I am informed that that case has been presented to the War Department and is part of the records of that Department. That case is asked to be sent to the Senate by this resolution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With all possible respect to the Senator from Utah, I submit that not even he would claim that that is an answer to my question. The Senator has made a very grave charge here and in very grave language, to wit, that some officer bearing the commission of the United States, or some soldier wearing its uniform, has been guilty of "cold-blooded murder." "Cold-blooded murder!"—those were the Senator's words. Now, I ask the Senator, who is charged with cold-blooded murder? What is his name? A charge like that, Mr. President, should be made specific.

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator knows the name as well as I.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know the name.

Mr. RAWLINS. The information is as accessible to the Senator as it is to me, and more so. It is based upon the sworn testimony of soldiers in the United States Army. The case has been made up by leading citizens, who would not think of instigating such a charge except upon sufficient foundation. It was presented to the War Department, and the answer of the Secretary of War, if I have not been misinformed, was to the effect not that this charge was not true, but that the men who had been guilty of the crime had left the islands and were now within the borders of the United States; and, as I understand it, that there was no means now by which to cause their return to the place where the crime was committed in order that they might be prosecuted and punished.

The Senator from Massachusetts the other day confirmed what I now state by the introduction of a bill, which is pending here, providing for the return of persons thus charged with crime from the United States to the islands, in order that they might be prosecuted and punished.

I am not making a charge against the War Department or anyone else. I am simply, by this resolution, asking for information, and the Senator from Indiana can not with consistency claim that I ought to disclose the case, present the proof upon which it is based, and at the same time seek to circumvent and prevent the only process by which the information can be obtained. If the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Massachusetts are acting in good faith in this matter, in order that justice may be done, that wrong may be punished, then they can not consistently object to the only method which is now available for obtaining accurate information, so that only those who are guilty may be accused and those who are innocent may not be accused.

I am not here to say that any particular individual is guilty of murder, but from the circumstances disclosed and the information made public we have reason to infer that a foul crime has been committed and that somebody is guilty of that crime. We have the high authority of the Secretary of War, in response to a letter addressed to him, to the effect that the criminal who is guilty of that crime is within our borders, but under the present condition of the law he can not be reached.

When we have legislation on this important subject, involving the question as to whether in one of our possessions men may be murdered in cold blood, and whether those who may be responsible for that, having escaped to this country, can go unwhipped of justice, I should like to know how and why it is that we can not, by a simple resolution, call for information bearing upon this question, known to be in the possession of the War Department, and which, under existing circumstances, is not available to the House of Representatives or to the Senate.

Mr. President, one word further in relation to this matter. For political ends in advance of an election, to best subserve and promote the interests of the dominant party, I could well understand that suppression of facts temporarily might be sought in order to meet a political exigency; but the election is now over and, at least so far as I am concerned, there is no question of political triumph involved in this matter; but we find here these records involving facts of greater or less notoriety, involving the honor of the people of the United States, involving the integrity and the honor of the Army of the United States, or persons who have for the time being been charged with authority in that Army.

I insist, Mr. President, that while what I say may be futile as influencing action at present, the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts ought not to prevail, and upon that motion I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I had entertained the hope, which I think was held in common by all upon one side and most upon the other side of this Chamber, that we had come to an end of the policy of badger of American soldiers and American officers. It was not my intention, but the exact contrary, to say one word upon this resolution. But I was astonished that the Senator's earnestness compelled him to utter words which demand from him more definite and particular details. The Senator used the words that cold-blooded murder had been committed by some one bearing the commission of the United States or some soldier wearing its uniform.

That is a charge, Mr. President, which can not be made in a general way. The Army of the United States is, as a body, not to rest under the red brand of those words of the Senator from Utah. Therefore he owes it to the Senate, he owes it to the country, and, most of all, he owes it to himself that he shall be relieved of the inference that anyone must necessarily draw, that he applies this general term to everybody. And if it does not apply to everybody, to whom does it apply?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator has little conception of the meaning of the English language if he so interprets what I said as that I charge any specific individual with murder. What I said was that by the sworn affidavits of eyewitnesses, American soldiers, this charge had been made; that I had seen those affidavits, and that those affidavits had been laid before the War Department.

I do not permit the Senator from Indiana, following the example of those upon the political hustings to meet a political exigency, to put words into my mouth which I did not utter; but, if he undertakes to do it, I will call his attention to it and ask him to rise to the dignity of a Senator and pretend, at least, to be fair. It is the old charge when we have called attention to tortures, which have proved to be true, that we have been arraigning the American Army. It is a false and infamous charge, and I cram it down the throats of the men who have falsely given it utterance, let it apply to whomsoever it may.

When I rise here to demand the vindication of justice, and when I do it upon the basis of sworn affidavits of American soldiers, when I ask for further information, the Senator undertakes to impute to me that I am falsely accusing American soldiers. I brand that statement as infamous, if not cowardly, and as simply attempting to put me in a false position, which I will not occupy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If that is the best explanation the Senator can give for his remarkable language here, I think the best friend the Senator has would advise him to accept the alternative of silence.

Mr. President, I did not accuse the Senator with falsely making a charge. The RECORD shows what the Senator said; we all heard what the Senator said; it was that cold-blooded murder had been committed. The Senator says that he did not make a specific charge. That is the point I make, Mr. President. I want the Senator to make that charge specific.

So long as I have a voice, Mr. President, the American Army and the American soldier in general shall not rest under that aspersion no matter from what source it comes. When the Senator uses that language, he knows that he is using serious words, and he ought to be prepared to specify the criminal and not cast suspicion on all who wear the uniform of the United States.

Mr. President, what inference can be drawn from the Senator's language except that somebody has done this deed? He says, "I do not say who;" and therefore the country is left to infer that it is anybody who marches under the colors of the Republic. The Senator says that—to use his elegant language—he will "cram that down the throat" of somebody or other, but I imagine when he undertakes that he will have to cram it down the throats of the entire American people.

What I am objecting to, what I think Senators on both sides of the Chamber object to, and what I imagine that the people of the country object to, is that there shall be an indefinite, intangible, diaphanous charge of bloody murder, red and crimson, made against the whole great organization of the Army of the United States, thereby putting under suspicion any man who wears our uniform. They will desire that the Senator shall specify who is guilty of the crime. When, therefore, the Senator says that he makes no specific charge, he makes the precise point to which I wish to call the Senator's attention.

I say, Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, that I had hoped that the exigency having passed, we had reached an end—put a period to the policy of aspersion which the Senator and others pursued last session with vigor, and, I am willing to admit, with ability, though conspicuously not with success. Therefore when the Senator makes these charges, perhaps in words more violent than any he has yet employed, it devolves upon him to make them specific, or else to frankly say that he does not think they apply to this man or the other man in the American Army.

Mr. President, the Senator has said something about a political exigency, which it was supposed we of the majority were required to meet. Well, the debate at the last session did spring out of a political exigency, but we were not the people who were in the emergency. It was not our exigency. It was necessary that an issue should be created for a party which was without one, for a party which had been orphaned of all issues, and Senators on the opposition side thought that they had found one in the conduct of the American soldiers. Therefore they instituted an inquiry, a so-called investigation of outrages by American soldiers upon the people of the Philippines, and many a speech, earnest and lurid, was made upon that subject. Why, Mr. President, that was the origin of the debate; and the exigency out of which it grew was the exigency of not having an issue in which the Senator from Utah and his associates found themselves. Well, that plan never succeeded, that issue hardly reached the hustings; it was almost stillborn; and if it did reach the hustings, if it did reach the people, the people repudiated it as they have seldom repudiated anything in American politics. They repudiated it as they have always repudiated, and, thank God, always will repudiate, an unjustified assault upon the soldiers who wear their colors.

I should like to know why it is, Mr. President, that the Senator from Utah, otherwise always fair, always almost judicial, seems to find it necessary, upon rumor or statement, no matter from what source it shall come, to impugn the conduct of American soldiers. Simply because they wear our uniform is no reason why they are outragers of women or murderers of men. On the contrary, I think the American soldier of to-day is the worthy successor of the American soldier of forty years ago, of those who fought in Mexico, and of those who fought in the revolution. They have the same uprightness of character, the same kindliness of conduct, the same courage in battle, the same invincibleness on the field—men of high spirit, men who have come from the bosom of American homes, with all the ideals which American homes inspire.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think the Senator himself has given the best argument and the best reason why this resolution should not be adopted.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Indiana a question before he sits down?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator, who has special means of information on this subject, if there has been such a court-martial as is described in the concluding sentence of the resolution which is now pending?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say to the Senator that I do not know; and I will say further to the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator send me the resolution so that I may have it before me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

I will say further to the Senator that it had not been my intention at all to give the slightest attention, so far as any speaking was concerned, to the resolution until I sat here and heard the language of the Senator from Utah, which I thought called upon me for an immediate reply, and which was broader, I think, than the Senator from Utah really, perhaps, meant to use. Nevertheless, it could not be permitted to go out in its original illimitableness without putting upon it some reasonable limitation.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that, but that does not answer the question I put to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did answer the question of the Senator by saying that I did not know.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Now, if it be true that there has been such a court-martial, as the Senator from Utah asked for the record of, it must be the record of a United States investigation. The resolution asks for—

> Any record or reports of investigations which may be on file in the War Department relating to the case of the so-called "Father Augustine," alleged to have been put to death by Cornelius M. Brownell, formerly a captain of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, at Banate, island of Panay, province of Iloilo, in December, 1900.

It must be true, then, must it not, that the authority of the United States Government itself has charged this man with that offense?

Mr. LODGE. If my colleague will excuse me, there is no statement that there was a court-martial in this case.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I asked the Senator from Indiana, whether he was informed in regard to that.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution is that the Secretary of War shall report the result of an investigation in regard to it.

Mr. HOAR. I understand, and my question was to elicit that very point—whether the Senator from Indiana is informed that there has or has not been a court-martial on this gentleman.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not informed; but I will say further, in answer to the Senator, that even if so, or even if otherwise it does not follow that we ought as a matter of policy to bring here, what perhaps we have a right to bring here, these records. At least I would never consent to it, for the reason urged by the Senator from Utah, which was that it might make the American people indignant.

Mr. HOAR. I am not, if the Senator will pardon me, dealing with that question, and I am not informed in this debate. It is said by the Senator, with great warmth and earnestness, that there have been certain charges made against American soldiers, by the Senator from Utah and others, of cruelties, and, in this particular case, of putting a clergyman to death by cruelty. My question is—I might extend it a little—whenever there has been a court-martial for such a crime, whether the United States Government has not made that charge? Whether in this particular case there has been a court-martial or not, the Senator does not know. My proposition, which I want to ask the Senator to consider, is whether it is quite fair to impute to anybody a desire to attack the American Army when the Government of the United States itself, through its military authorities, has in a great many cases at least made such charges?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator, I observe, honored me with his attention.

Mr. HOAR. I did.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that I rose to respond not to the resolution, but to the statement of the Senator from Utah, which I said then, and say now, I think broader than he would otherwise have used, but which could not be permitted to go on, that there had been cold-blooded murder—those were the words—committed by some one in the Army. I thought then that that should draw forth the question as to who had been guilty of this cold-blooded murder, and that drew out the response that the Senator made no specific charge. That left the charge resting upon the American Army in general that cold-blooded murder had been committed somewhere within its ranks, but the Senator would not take the responsibility of pointing it out, and that made necessary what seemed to me to be an answer to that general charge as not being reasonable or justified.

Mr. HOAR. Well, Mr. President, but the Senator from Utah based whatever he said—whether it was more extreme than was proper I do not know, and I am not saying as to that—but he based that statement on a request for a particular investigation by the War Department.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, an investigation upon a charge which the Senator in his speech was not willing to make specific. I was not so much objecting to his resolution—I had not given it any attention—as I was to the Senator's rather remarkable remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know, but I suppose all remarks are remarkable. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not think they are, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, whenever an effort has been made by Senators upon this side of the Chamber to discover the truth as to what is going on and what has been done in the Philippines, they are met by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, who have been as eager and zealous in their efforts to suppress the truth, with the charge that we are assailing the honor of the American Army. Mr. President, of all the mean and miserable lies that crawled through the last campaign, this charge that we have assailed the American Army is the meanest, the lowest, and the dirtiest of them all. It has been the very vermin of this debate; and I am very greatly surprised to find it crawling in the hair of the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE].

Assailing the American Army! Mr. President, Jake Smith is no more the American Army than the Senator from Indiana is the American Senate, and not half so much as he thinks he is. [Laughter.]

Here is a simple proposition, a resolution calling for information, specific information, with respect to specific cases, where court-martial proceedings have been had, in cases where, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says, charges have been made by the Government of the United States. We seek to learn for the benefit of the American people that which the War Department knows, but which it is determined that the American people shall not know; and because we simply ask for this specific information in specific cases we are met with the old, ridiculous, contemptible charge that we are assailing the honor of the American Army.

Mr. President, in what I have to say I intend to be within the rules. My present remarks, therefore, must not be understood as applying to any member of the Senate. Making that reservation, for the sake of being within the rules of the Senate, I say that whoever makes that charge, from the very highest to the very lowest, consciously takes a falsehood upon his lips when he utters it.

Mr. President, we are seeking for information which the Philippine Committee, or a majority of the Philippine Committee, have determined that we shall not have. They have suppressed an investigation ordered by the American Senate. They have refused to investigate the facts in the case of the alleged murder of Father Augustine. There are numbers of other cases in which names of witnesses were laid before that committee.

The Senator from Indiana demands to know who is charged. He had an opportunity to find the truth if he had not been determined that the American people should not know the truth. He has refused to investigate these matters; he has refused to permit witnesses to come before the Philippine Committee; and yet he says because we want the truth known, because we are seeking it from the War Department, because we ask them to lay facts before the Senate, that this constitutes a charge against the American Army.

Who made the charge? We have it on high authority that the court-martial trials in the Philippine Islands have been farcical; that men have been acquitted where they were guilty of the most heinous crimes. General MacArthur again and again disapproved the findings of the courts-martial on the ground that men guilty of the most infamous practices were either acquitted or subjected to a very light and insufficient punishment. Why have we not a right to know these things?

Mr. President, from the very beginning of this war there has been a policy of suppression. And these charges, sir, did not originate with Democratic Senators. They came from the representatives of great Republican newspapers there on the ground, who charged these crimes, and who said that the facts were suppressed and concealed; and the so-called investigations of the War Department have been shown by the records to be farcical and to be made simply for the purpose of whitewashing crimes and criminals.

We had a case before our committee, the case of Sergeant Riley. Every member of the committee admitted that his testimony was true. They said it was not necessary to call other witnesses to substantiate it. Yet the War Department had published the charge broadcast over the country that this man was a liar, and had admitted that he was a liar; that he had admitted that the story he wrote in his letter of the application of the water torture was not true. When he was brought before the committee he showed, and the committee admitted it to be true, that not only was the statement in his letter correct, but that the Army officer detailed by the Secretary of War to make that investigation had made a dishonest investigation and a false and untruthful report. Yet that officer never was punished. He was never even reprimanded by the President or by the Secretary of War.

Sir, we had a case—it is official; it does not rest upon the testimony of any witness; it appears in the official reports—where a charge had been made of the murder of prisoners, and though the Inspector-General in his report showed very clearly that he thought an American officer had been guilty of the murder of those prisoners, the only recommendation was the court-martial of a single private. When it came to Judge-Advocate Crowder, he wrote his indorsement upon the back of it that it would not do to press the court-martial against the private, because he would defend himself by saying that he acted under the orders of his superior officer and the facts developed would implicate too many others. The court-martial investigation was stopped on the express ground that the murder of prisoners was too common a practice by officers of the United States to bear investigation.

Mr. President, in the Glenn court-martial, which has been going on over there, he defended himself on the ground that the orders issued by Chaffee and Smith authorized him and other officers to commit these outrages. Major Glenn, in testifying, said that General Chaffee said to him:

> I want you to go to Samar to help Gen. Jacob Smith. I do not know the conditions in Samar. Smith makes no report to me. I do not want him to make any.

And Captain Swain swore in that trial—

> that he informed General Smith that several thousand of the residents of his district who had been driven into the mountains had become friendly to the Americans, and that they must be allowed to return to their homes, or they would starve. General Smith, according to the witness, replied: "Let them die. The sooner they die the sooner we will have peace."

Mr. President, I say we have a right, and the American people have a right, to get the facts in this case; and I want to say that the War Department in no single case has prosecuted an investigation which has brought to light a single fact until the facts had become notorious and been published broadcast throughout the United States.

The President has declared that he intended to prosecute a rigid investigation and to punish all those who had been guilty of these crimes. If the Administration did it was because they were driven to it by the minority in the Senate and by gentlemen whom they have denounced in the bitterest terms—the members of the Anti-Imperialist League. Whatever investigation they have made they have been forced to make by them. Then they turn "like a dog that is compelled to fight, and snatch at the master that doth tarre him on."

Mr. President, this is a very simple question. If the majority of the Senate want to know the truth they will pass this resolution. If they wish to proceed as they have proceeded from the beginning, upon the idea of suppressing the truth and keeping the knowledge of it from the American people, they will smother and defeat it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I admire the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] for many things—for his eloquence, his ability, his industry, his kindly heart, but most of all for his versatility; and I am bound to say that whatever rôle he essays he carries out with distinction and address. We have this morning an example of that in his effort to represent the statue of Truth Enlightening the Senate. [Laughter.] The Senator has assumed the rôle of the Apostle of Veracity without a single disciple. He has taken the position of president of the great monopoly or trust engaged in the exclusive business of the search for truth.

But let us see whether or not the Senator's recollection is correct. The Senator is a fellow-member with myself of the Committee on the Philippines. He says that the investigation which the Senate ordered was suppressed. When was it suppressed; by what method was it suppressed, and why does the Senator say so? Is not this the reason the Senator says so? Because it did not result as the Senator had hoped it would result. It did not result in putting upon the American Army and the conduct of the Government in the Philippines the brand which the Senator had thought would be placed there, but it resulted instead in their complete and brilliant vindication.

Mr. President, for weeks and months that investigation proceeded. No limit was put on the examination of witnesses. If any witness was not called by the committee, except Miss Lopez, I have forgotten it; and the reasons for not calling her were, I think, discussed in the Senate.

Mr. CARMACK rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If there is any other, remind me of it.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I want to ask the Senator if he knows how much time was devoted by the committee to the investigation of charges of outrages committed in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not to the day and hour. Perhaps the Senator can tell me.

Mr. CARMACK. I will say for the Senator's benefit that of course we spent only from an hour to an hour and a half a day in the investigation, and a great part of the time, by very much the larger portion of the time, was devoted to investigation along other lines. If the committee had sat continuously for seven hours a day, it could have completed all the investigation it made with respect to charges of outrages in four days. That was the time actually spent by the committee on that question, though the Secretary of War, with his usual loose and lavish unveracity, said it was five months.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, time—hours, minutes—I submit to any practitioner of the law or any member of this body, constitute no measure of work done. The answer to the Senator is sufficient when it is reflected and recalled by the Senate that the report of the committee's investigation occupied between three and four thousand pages, or even more, two volumes, closely printed, each as large as this [exhibiting]. A further fact will sufficiently answer the Senator.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator mean——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator mean that there were three or four thousand pages devoted to an investigation of the charges of outrages in the Philippine Islands? Does the Senator say that?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I say the investigation, in obedience to the Senate's resolution, and in which the Senator participated very ably, and in which all the other Senators upon the minority side of the Senate participated with more or less ability, and all with equal vigor, occupied that many pages.

Mr. CARMACK. My point is, the Senator says we spent several months investigating charges of outrages in the Philippine Islands, and that the book occupies three or four thousand pages, containing the result of the investigation of the committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. CARMACK. I say that the committee did not spend more than four days, and perhaps a hundred and fifty pages would cover all the testimony that was taken, upon that point; and I say further that a majority of the committee suppressed the investigation just at the time when the most important witnesses were to testify before the committee, and refused to summon a single one of those witnesses or to permit them to come before the committee, and it occupies the same attitude at this session of Congress.

We had the witnesses in the case of Father Augustine, and numbers of other witnesses; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said a list as long as his arm. And he made the distinct promise here, upon the floor of the Senate, that if we would allow the Philippine bill to come to a vote on a certain day, he would proceed immediately with the investigation. We permitted the bill to come to a vote, and the Senator from Massachusetts fled from the city of Washington, and never could we get another meeting of the Philippine Committee. That is the truth.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If, as the Senator says (and I should be slow to dispute any statement the Senator deliberately makes), the investigation of the so-called outrages occupies a less number than 3,000 pages, I call attention to the fact that it was the Senator's fault and the fault of his associates, because this whole Republic, in which there were tens of thousands of soldiers who had been in the Philippines, was searched as with a drag net for those who, from discontent or any other motive, would testify against their comrades or their officers.

When the name of one of those was laid before the chairman of the committee—and many of them were so laid by the Senator himself—my information and understanding were that they were immediately subpœnaed; and I remember, and the Senator remembers, that on one occasion we had two or three soldiers here at a time.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator says that when these names were laid before the chairman of the committee he immediately had the persons subpœnaed. That is just exactly what the chairman of the committee did not do, and just exactly what he refused to do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Up at least to the time of the end of the session, because I remember the cataract and avalanche of witnesses. They were waiting in the corridors. While one was being examined others were waiting in the corridors. They were waiting at hotels, so fast were they called; and the papers were full of statements as to what these men would disclose with respect to the outrage and infamy of the conduct of American soldiers in the Philippines. And yet when they were put upon the stand their testimony was that the conduct of our soldiers and officers, as a usual thing, was one of great kindness and of unusual consideration, such conduct as led the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] to say, examining one of the witnesses, "A trip across the ocean you did not find had changed the character of American soldiers?"

The Senator will remember that the cross-examination, after Riley was on the stand—I begun the cross-examination and then it was pursued by others and me, too—brought out the fact that the Filipino wounded, instead of being treated with cruelty, were treated with mercy and consideration unparalleled in war, ancient or modern, among civilized or uncivilized peoples; that they were cared for by American surgeons; that they were nursed by American nurses; that they were ministered to with American medicines; that they were cared for in American hospitals, and, in general, that they received the same treatment that our wounded soldiers received who laid by their side.

That was the view the American people took of it, and therefore I am not very much surprised, if it is true, as the Senator says it is true, that, having called witnesses, and having found that the cry was not justified by the event, the chairman refused to squander longer the public time and the public money and the very valuable energies of my friend from Tennessee, as well as the rest of us, in further pursuing an investigation which had thus far not lived up to its promise. Because the Senator will bear us out that all of the witnesses upon whom he most relied testified in unison to the splendid conduct of the American Army and American officers as a usual thing to those people, both in war and in peace, and that testimony was from General Hughes and General MacArthur clear down to every private, even the discredited one, whose name I have now forgotten, who testified about the outrage said to have been perpetrated in his presence by a captain. The captain afterwards appeared and was vindicated.

So it appears there was an investigation. It appears, further, that all these people, at least up to the time the Senator mentions, were called, and they were questioned and cross-questioned. If time was wasted, I ask the Senator, whose fault was it that it was wasted?

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator wants a candid answer, I think it was his fault more than anybody else's.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought the Senator would say that. I will not answer him with a quip and an epithet, weapons he so skillfully uses. Nevertheless I have a better answer, a weapon more effective—the facts. They will show that my cross-examination of witnesses was brief and to the point, and except in the case of the discredited scoundrel—and that is a word I seldom use—who was brought here to testify to unspeakable and indescribable outrages upon Filipinos by one of the captains in our Army, and who afterwards was denounced by the Senator himself, whose sense of manhood was insulted by this witness—with the exception of that one witness, I think it will be found that my cross-examination of those witnesses did not occupy a page and a half or two pages. But that witness I did cross-examine till his falsehoods were demonstrated and his base motives revealed.

But what is the truth about the other side wasting time? The Senator will remember that the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], the two lawyers on the minority of the committee, occupied not hours, but days and even weeks, examining General MacArthur and others on the minutia of the topography of Manila and its surroundings. Here was a great issue which they proposed to try before the American people—an issue of the conduct of the people's government in the people's possessions. They said they had the witnesses. They gave us the names. The witnesses were subpœnaed. And, Mr. President, when the witnesses came here weeks were lost in futile cross-examination as to the topography—as to where this and that place was situated, and where the river ran, and all that sort of thing. That is the way time was wasted before the committee, and I appeal in proof of it to the testimony itself, which every Senator may have by sending a page for it.

Mr. President, I had not the remotest idea that I should say one word upon this resolution. This debate was precipitated by what I thought was the rather intemperate language of my honorable friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. But it has grown as running debate always grows. It has resulted as debate always should result—in throwing light upon the situation.

We find, then, that we have no specific charge, but a general accusation. We find that as to the investigation heretofore conducted, instead of bearing fruit from the seed of its promise, it failed before its first shoots had even sprang above the earth itself. We find that the American Army, charged in the speech, intemperate as it was vigorous, ill advised as it was emphatic, was splendidly vindicated by the testimony of every witness the Senators themselves called, and that that vindication was ratified by the overwhelming suffrage of the American people, as it always will be.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, Capt. Cornelius M. Brownell was a Vermont officer. I have known him well for years. There is no better specimen of the volunteer soldier in Vermont or in any other State than Captain Brownell. He was a captain in the militia before the Spanish war. He was a captain in a Vermont regiment in the Spanish war. He was the only captain of that regiment who was recommended for a commission in the Philippine volunteers.

I give from the Record and Pension Office his efficiency report. I will state that it is the highest in every respect that is given to any officer. In these reports certain words are used for the different grades. "Excellent" is the highest; then there is "Very good," and so on down. I will give the heads where the reports are given:

2. General statement of important duties and how performed. Did excellent work in front of Jaro in November, 1899; commanded company and station at Sara, and did splendid work in repulsing night assault by insurgents in greatly superior numbers, inflicting heavy losses and at the minimum loss to himself.

3. Habits, general conduct, and bearing, * * * excellent.

4. Professional zeal and ability, * * * excellent.

5. The condition and discipline of men under his immediate control, * * * excellent.

6. Capacity for command, * * * excellent.

That is the highest rating given in any case in these reports.

8. Special knowledge he possesses of any particular line of work, whatever its nature. Banking and manufacturing.

9. Should he be intrusted with important duties requiring discretion and judgment? Yes.

10. Has he been specially mentioned, favorably or unfavorably, in official reports of commanding officers? If yes, give reference to reports. * * * Yes; favorably by his immediate commanding officers.

Captain Brownell was selected for his efficiency as an officer to command a certain district in which his own company of the Twenty-sixth Regiment was located and detachments from other regiments. It was a district disturbed, and where there had been much trouble. On one occasion—it is a matter of record—Captain Brownell saved his company from massacre. The plan had been arranged and it was all divulged. The presidente of the town was at the head of it. The arms were concealed in the immediate vicinity. The officers had been invited to a dinner at the house of one of the leading people that night. The men were to be distributed. They had been invited to dances in different sections. Except for the providential return of Captain Brownell, after an absence in another part of his district, and his vigilance his command would have been massacred. One of regiment, Private O'Hearn, was roasted over a slow fire, mutilated, and horribly massacred. By the administration of the water cure, not by Captain Brownell, the murderers were discovered and the bones of the murdered man found and identified by his teeth.

Now, to judge of Captain Brownell, let any man put himself in his place, with the responsibility of his command, with the treachery that he had to deal with. Let him consider the circumstances before he judges him.

Here is a copy of a voluntary statement made up by Captain Brownell to the Judge-Advocate-General, who was sent to investigate this matter. I ask the Secretary to read it. It is fair that Captain Brownell's own statement should be heard.

The Secretary read as follows:

Voluntary statement of Cornelius M. Brownell, late captain Company D, Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry.

I am a resident of Burlington, Vt. My business address is 195 College street, Burlington.

I was appointed a captain July 12, 1899, and was assigned to command Company D July 17, 1899. I went with the company to the Philippines on or about September 5, 1899, sailing from San Francisco on or about September 25, 1899. After various stops we disembarked at Iloilo, island of Panay, October 28, 1899, and took station the same day at Jaro. After the active operations in the region of Jaro during the month of November, 1899, which accomplished the disintegration of the Filipino army on that island, I was ordered by the department commander to take command of the district of Concepcion, the northeastern district of the island, with headquarters at Sara. My command consisted of Company D, Twenty-sixth Infantry. Being situated about 65 miles from General Hughes's headquarters, and cut off from all communication with reenforcements, the enemy in the district immediately assumed an aggressive attitude. Soon discovering that a very strong outpost was located at a small barrio overlooking the town, I ordered a force, on the morning of December 19, 1899, to capture and destroy the town, which was called San Pomongbolo.

This expedition was entirely successful and a complete surprise to the enemy, and so aroused the insurgent leaders in the district that on the early morning of December 22, 1899, at about 5.30 o'clock, my garrison was desperately attacked by a force consisting of practically all the insurgents in the district, in which were about 200 rifles and 300 bolomen. This attack was repulsed after a vigorous fight, and an investigation of the affair after the attack showed conclusively to my mind that the padre of the town was in communication with the insurgent forces and was aware of the attack about to be made, and he secretly departed the town in the early evening before the attack, taking with him his valuables and the female inmates of his house. I constantly became more convinced of this during the following three months' service in that district, and learned that the padre was endeavoring in every possible way to create disloyalty and further the cause of the insurrection, in order that his personal prerogatives might not become abridged by our supremacy. I further learned that he was not a regularly admitted priest, but, on the contrary, was a native who had usurped the office of priest when his predecessor fled.

On March 1, 1900, I took command of the district of Baratoc Viejo, Banate, and Anileo, with headquarters at Banate, having as a permanent garrison Company D, Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, being reenforced at different times by detachments and companies from the Twenty-sixth Infantry, Eighteenth Infantry, and Thirty-eighth Infantry. Acting on the information I had gained as to the attitude of the padre at Sara, I soon discovered that the padre at Banate was acting in a similar manner. By this time I had also learned that the so-called principales, a class composed of the rich inhabitants, mostly mestizos, owned all the land, enjoyed all the education and liberty, and while they resided in the towns and readily took the oath of allegiance to the United States, if permitted to do so, were furnishing the sinews of war to the insurgents in the field, and that probably 90 per cent of the Filipinos are dependent upon this class, either directly or indirectly, for a living. It was discovered that the power of the padres, and that of the principales, was exerted to the utmost to prevent the success of the American forces, because success of the American arms meant freedom and education to all Filipinos alike, and thus the power of the aristocracy would be gone.

During my service in the field I reported directly to the department commander, and received orders in like manner from him, and was at all times foot loose and freely made expeditions into districts remote from my own, sometimes being furnished a gunboat to transport my command.

While on one of these expeditions, about the middle of October, 1900, to the district of Sara—at this time commanded by Lieut. Col. William Van Horn, Eighteenth Infantry—I was absent for about eight days, and upon my return to my station at Banate I discovered that the inhabitants were acting in a disloyal and insubordinate manner, and every indication went to show that some insurgent plot was on foot. After a few days' investigation I discovered that during my absence the insurgent leaders of the district had held a meeting within the town, and the presidente had undertaken to organize a bolo company with which to massacre the garrison in the near future, the plan being to have several parties arranged for the men on a particular night in order that the garrison might be as much divided as possible, and at a certain signal, to be given by the presidente, each house to be surrounded and the soldiers dispatched. The natives implicated were arrested, and some time afterwards the presidente, who had broken his parole and escaped in the night, was recaptured and was sentenced to serve ten years in Billabid Prison at Manila. Meantime the padre at Banate, Raphael Murillo, fled, and I discovered that he had been warned by one Augustine de la Pena, a priest of Molo, and had been directed to escape to the lines of the enemy in the field. This padre Augustine was held to be the acting head of the church on the island, and a relative of the insurgent chief, Quintin Salas, who operated in the region of my district.

Serving directly under the orders of the department commander I was frequently at his headquarters, and know a great deal about his military information bureau and the secrets in their possession. It was conceded at headquarters that Padre Augustine, while professing to be an Americanisto and in constant communication with General Hughes's office, was nevertheless the treasurer of the insurgent funds and practically the head of the insurrection on the island of Panay. It was well known that he was a war traitor, and that if papers and funds in his possession belonging to the insurgent army could be procured the insurrection could be readily crushed. This man was delivered into my hands on board the gunboat Paragua on November 23, 1900, and taken to my station at Banate under a guard of soldiers not belonging to my company. He was landed at Banate the following morning, and while I was absent during that day with my company and a detachment of Company F, Twenty-sixth Infantry, he signed a statement confessing his guilt and addressed to General Hughes, and copy of which is hereto attached and marked "A."

This statement was handed me upon my return to the post that day, and within a few days the man was brought from his cell and told plainly that he would be compelled to deliver to me the funds in his possession belonging to the insurgent forces, and papers known to be in his possession, implicating others who had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States Government. This he refused to do, and denied that he was a sympathizer with the insurgent forces, denied that he had any dealings whatever or any communications of any sort whatever with them, or that he knew anything about their cause. Being in possession of positive evidence of his guilt, and knowing that there was on deposit in the city of Iloilo a large sum of money awaiting his order at the mercantile house of Hoskyn & Co., the banking houses of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, and the Banquo Espanol, I insisted that he would be obliged to deliver orders for this money to me and endeavored in every possible way to reason with him and show him the uselessness of further attempts at deception.

If I recall correctly, I held daily conversations with him for a period of three or four days, endeavoring in every possible way to influence him to surrender the papers and money in his possession without compulsion, promising him fair treatment on the part of the Government. He became constantly more and more insolent, and began to suspect that I would not use force, so that he finally denied everything in the statement he had previously made; said that he did not understand what it was; that it was written in English and he was told to sign it, and he thought it was a letter to be used to inform his friends where he was. He gradually became so insolent that it became necessary to adopt a firm course of action with him, and he was given a limited time in which to decide whether he would surrender the money and papers demanded without compulsion or whether he would compel me to resort to the latter method. The time given him having expired without result, he was brought into my presence and that of other officers and enlisted men and told that he would be blindfolded and the water cure administered until he acceded to my request.

He again, and more insolently than ever, denied that he had any knowledge of the matters of which I spoke, and the water cure was administered for a short time, I being constantly near him and advising him at every stage that the moment he admitted what I knew to be true, and delivered the goods I knew to be in his possession, harsh measures would cease. In about three or four minutes he informed me that if I would cease he would speak. I immediately commanded that he be allowed to sit up, and he said that he did have some money in his possession, but that it belonged to the Pope at Rome, and that therefore he could not give it to me. Endeavoring in all this proceeding to act in a gentlemanly manner, but firmly, I told him that the idea of compulsion was abhorrent to an American officer, but he would be obliged to cease falsehood, and deliver the papers and moneys to me immediately or the cure would be continued. He still insisted that it belonged to the Pope at Rome, and being assured that for the time being the department commander, General Hughes, was the Pope on that island, and that he would be obliged to deliver the money into his hands, the cure was continued. In a few moments he became convinced that I was in positive possession of the evidence I claimed, and again asked to be allowed to sit up.

This request was immediately granted him, and he said that he did have some money belonging to the insurgent cause. I then asked him to sign orders for it, at the same time asking him in as kindly a manner as possible under the circumstances if he would not accede to my whole request without further use of force. This he agreed to do. I allowed him, as he was in a very excited and desperate mental condition and was a man of low vitality, large and fat, to retire to his quarters and rest. This was of my own volition, and before he was led away he was asked if he would sign, without further resort to force, the orders which he had promised to sign. This he agreed to do. He was offered at this time, and during his whole confinement, food, but he declined in most instances, sometimes accepting and at other times insolently refusing it. After he had rested at some length, I sent for him and asked him to sign the orders, and he, in the presence of officers and a few enlisted men, declined, saying that he had no money and that what he had said before he now retracted. He was immediately threatened with a repetition of the water cure, and after some further endeavor on my part to get him to sign these orders, I directed that he again be led to the room in which the water cure had been previously administered, which was the kitchen of my quarters.

As preparations were being made, and he became convinced that I meant what I said, he signed the orders. A little later his cassock was examined, and in it were found the original deposit receipts on the banks and the house of Hoskyn & Co., together with numerons papers, receipts for money from different citizens and churches, which were delivered by me to the then judge-advocate of the Department of the Visayas, together with other papers and evidence collected by me bearing on this case, and implicating some of the prominent natives in the city of Iloilo and that vicinity. One of these papers was a receipt which read, so near as I can remember, as follows, being written in Spanish:

"We, the undersigned, commissioners of the revolutionary army on the island of Panay, acknowledge to have received from Señor ——, presidente of Jaro, Panay, the sum of 10,000 pesos, which sum, with others of like amount, has been raised by the church at Jaro for the use of the revolutionary army."

This was signed, if I recall correctly, by two commissioners. The original of this paper can be found in the records of the Department of the Visayas. The presidente mentioned in that papar was then presidente of Jaro, and as such was an American official.

I was ordered to ascertain from the prisoner the whereabouts of one Quintin Salas, a colonel in command of a subdivision of the insurgent army. When this prisoner was sent for I explained to him my orders, and asked him to tell me, on promise of my shielding him should he tell me the truth.

He was in a dejected mood, despondent, thoroughly discouraged. He told me that he had better be dead, and wished he might die. He had nothing further to live for, and expected, if the American Government did not hang him, the insurgent forces would, and that he realized he had been a traitor to both sides and a traitor to his church, and, upon exposure of his traitorous conduct while acting at the head of the church in the island, he would certainly be deposed and disgraced in the church, and he repeatedly called on the Virgin Mary to take his life. I gave him until a certain hour to consider whether he would disclose this hiding place or not, and explained to him how I knew he was in possession of this information. At the expiration of this time he declined to disclose Salas's whereabouts, and again, more emphatically, said he had better be dead than living anyway, and hoped he would die before morning.

I directed him to be conducted to a house apart from the headquarters in order that he might be quietly and carefully dealt with, as the night guard was on at headquarters and there were a large number of enlisted men within hearing. A guard was established to prevent all natives from approaching the house, as it had come to my knowledge that the whereabouts of Padre Augustine were known to the insurgents, and a desperate effort would be made to retake him.

Exhausting every resource in my endeavor to influence him by argument into giving me the information desired I threatened him again with the water cure, and he promptly told me that he would welcome it, as he did not want to live, and was completely and thoroughly discouraged. I hoped up to the last moment that he would weaken before it became necessary to use any force whatever, but continued the preparations, and finally ordered that the cure be again administered to him, and stepped into an adjoining room for a moment with instructions that the cure should be given, but the moment he would disclose the name of the town only it should be stopped. In a very short time, probably not to exceed a minute and a half, I was warned by a disturbance in the room where the prisoner was that something was wrong, and upon entering the room the man was dead.

I immediately sent for the post surgeon, and within five minutes—the exact time I can not give—the post surgeon arrived and notified me that the man was dead, but not drowned, as he had not died from the effects of the water cure, but from fatty degeneration of the heart, and from complete collapse and mental anguish over the exposure of his criminal life. At my request he immediately attempted to resuscitate him to life. He told me it was useless, as water was not the cause of his death. This verbal statement he made to me, and made a certificate certifying to the cause of his death, which I filed with a notice of the death of this prisoner in the office of the assistant adjutant-general of the Department of the Visayas.

I presented the papers obtained and orders for the money in person to the judge-advocate of the department at Iloilo, and the department commander ordered the provost-marshal at Iloilo, the officer in command of the secret police of Iloilo, the judge-advocate-general, and myself to visit the banking houses mentioned above and procure the money.

Within a few days all the padres in the vicinity of headquarters at Iloilo held a convention and sent a delegation to the department commander, requesting permission to appoint a peace commission to proceed to the interior and endeavor to influence the insurgents under arms to surrender. This permission was granted by the department commander, and such committee visited the insurgent chiefs in the field, and after conferences, which extended over several weeks, the commander of the insurgent army surrendered.

During the period in which these conferences were going on, by direction of the department commander I was in the field in the region of the greater part of General Delgardo's army, and when it seemed probable that the peace commission would fail, active operations were pushed against the enemy and their property, and especially the property of the rich haciendo owners who lived in Iloilo, all of whom were supporting the insurgent army in this particular region. This hastened the final decision of the insurgents to surrender, and on or about January 29, 1901, at a suggestion from the adjutant-general, I joined him at Pototan, where the army which had been operating in the region of my district surrendered, four companies strong, and in less than a month my regiment was ordered home, and the insurrection on the island of Panay was practically over and other surrenders took place immediately after the surrender at Pototan.

The water cure was administered by my order several times to different natives, and through this agency I was enabled to obtain possession of many arms and very valuable information without firing a shot or shedding blood. When my regiment first reached the island, it was customary and necessary, in order to accomplish anything on the offensive, to make long night marches, rounding up and capturing towns in the darkness, not only exposing our men to hardships and disease, but to gunshot wounds, as well as endangering the lives of noncombatant natives by the fire from our men. In these night attacks it was always possible to have women and children killed, and frequently the insurgent soldiers for whom we were seeking would escape, and usually few arms could be taken in this manner. From service and observation I became fully convinced that the lives of both our troops and of the natives could be saved and munitions of war and valuable information obtained by the discreet and humane use of the water cure. I do not and never have believed it cruel or barbarous in any manner, and whenever it became necessary, in my judgment, to administer it, the men chosen for that duty were chosen with a view to having only intelligent, careful, and humane men perform the operation. There was no secrecy about it; every officer and every man, both in my regiment and of every other regiment with which I served, knew when it was given, and I was never criticised by any officer while in the service for administering it.

The first criticism offered against me was by an enlisted man in my company, one Alfred W. Bertrand, and he is the instigator of the charges now brought against me, and did openly and repeatedly state while the regiment was en route home and while we were at Presidio, Cal., awaiting muster out, that unless he was given a discharge bearing a character of excellent that he would prevent my appointment to a commission in the regular service and would prevent my living in the State of Vermont, my native State, because of charges of misconduct, cruelty, and embezzlement which he proposed to bring against me. During the muster out of the regiment he endeavored in every possible manner to create discord and cause a riot in my command, and openly boasted that at the pay table there would be a riot. He did everything in his power to get as many of the men as intoxicated as possible by furnishing money for that purpose and by furnishing it himself. He appealed from the character given, "Very good." I was sustained by a board appointed by the regimental commander under the regulations.

I was advised by the regimental commander at the time, Col. J. T. Dickman, to bring the man before a court and have him dishonorably discharged the service. He intimidated as many men as he could, and assaulted Q. M. Sergt. Robert D. Hoyt with two accomplices for testifying against him before the board appointed to revise his character, said Sergeant Hoyt having been discharged at Iloilo and not then being in the service. This man Bertrand performed very little duty with his company and was a mischief-maker throughout his entire service. In spite of his unworthy conduct, I gave him a character of "Very good," as he had been for many years a soldier and it was understood that he desired to reenlist.

CORNELIUS M. BROWNELL.

OCTOBER 14, 1902.

Then appeared the above Cornelius M. Brownell and made oath that the above statement was true, before me,

Judge- Advocate, U. S. Army.

NOVEMBER 24, 1900.

Gen. R. P. HUGHES, Iloilo, P. I.

SIR: I hereby certify that I am the head of the insurrection on the island of Panay; that I have been the headquarters for furnishing money and arms for the insurgent cause; that in the future I promise allegiance to the United States of America, and that I will do all in my power to aid you to establish peace in this island. Also that I send this letter of my own free will and accord.

AUGUSTIN DE LA PENA.

A true copy:
C. M. BROWNELL,
Late Captain Twenty-sixth Infantry, U. S. Volunteers.

During the reading of the paper,

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the regular order be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, I hope the resolution which was under discussion a few moments ago will be permitted to go over, retaining its place until to-morrow morning, when I shall desire to submit some remarks on it, more as a suggestion than anything else.

Mr. PROCTOR. As I expected to take but a few moments more, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until I can conclude.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection. Then the resolution can go over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that he may complete his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. There is no objection, with the understanding that then the resolution will go over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has not yet been determined.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that will be determined now.

Mr. LODGE. I think the resolution had better go over, holding its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] asks unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the table, retaining its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

After the reading of the paper,

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, Father Augustine was the head and front of the insurrection in his district. From his standing in the church he was able to give direction to the priests of other churches, and, contrary to the canons of the church, he diverted the revenues of the church from their legitimate purposes to send to the insurrectos. A large amount of money in drafts which he had collected was taken from him, which was turned over after his capture to the proper officials. I will read an official letter from him to the churches over which he had charge:

DUMANGAS, December 8, 1899.

In view of the grave reasons and causes as stated by Martin Delgado, the politico-military governor residing in Cabatuan, general in chief of the army of Panay, and bearing in mind the great responsibility before God of the alienation of the revenues of the church which are intrusted to our care—for you are aware of the canons relating to the same—nevertheless, depending on the benignity of the church and desiring to avoid the unhappy contingencies that may arise for these pueblos, and believing that you are of the same opinion, I authorize each of you at the request of the politico-military governor of this province to turn over to him as a loan the sum of 80 pesos, except the parishes of Zarraga, Leganes, Mina, Banate, Anilao, Barotac, Viejo, and Mandurriao, which will, in the case of each, turn over 50 pesos.

These sums will be deducted from the revenues of the churches that you administer, and will be turned over to the said politico-military governor, Martin Delgado. You will enter in an account book the amount so delivered, and you will be given, when the opportunity offers, a receipt for the same.

Please circulate this with all precautions to prevent its loss, after copying the same.

May God guard you many years.

PADRE AUGUSTIN DE LA PENA.

This was sent to the churches and acknowledged by them. As I have said, it is taken from the records.

PADRE APURA.

Entered and copied; sent to San Miguel—Paria, November 12, 1899.
PADRE MANSUETO ZABALA.

Entered and copied. Although this small church finds itself without funds, I send 20 pesos of my own to General Delgado, as the petty income does not even cover the most necessary expenses. Sent to Alimodian—San Miguel, November 13, 1899.

PADRE TOMAS PALMES.

Entered and copied. Although this church finds itself without funds, I sent 25 pesos of my own to General Delgado, as the petty income does not even cover the most necessary expenses—Alimodian, November 14, 1899.

PADRE RAMON AMPARO.

Entered and copied in the book per orders. I will send to the honorable general in chief, politico military governor of Panay, the sum of 40 pesos, all that this church at present possesses, promising to remit the balance of 80 pesos in small installments as this church finds itself in funds.

Massin, November 14, 1899.

PADRE MARCELO ESPINOSA.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not exactly catch the purpose of the Senator. I certainly can not understand how it is he gets hold of these papers belonging to the church, and that therein we have supposed evidence that some priest somewhere authorized a loan by the church to somebody. Now, who is that somebody? Is the American Government engaged in borrowing Catholic Church funds in the Philippines?

Mr. PROCTOR. Not at all. This was a contribution from those churches to Father Augustine to be used for the insurrectos.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator make that statement on his own responsibility?

Mr. PROCTOR. I make it on the responsibility of the evidence that Captain Brownell furnished, all of which is official.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand that Captain Brownell is on trial in the Senate?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not understand any such thing; but an officer of the Judge-Advocate-General's Department was sent to investigate this matter, and Captain Brownell made this voluntary statement, which I am giving.

Mr. TILLMAN. The effort to get the report of the court-martial which the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] made in the resolution he offered yesterday morning is thwarted and stopped because the Government is endeavoring to suppress the facts.

Mr. PROCTOR. There never has been any court-martial or any official charges, so far as I know, made against Captain Brownell. I am talking about Captain Brownell only.

Mr. TILLMAN. If Captain Brownell is charged with murder in the Philippines, is there any way of punishing him, or is he going back there to stand trial?

Mr. PROCTOR. That is a matter I can not answer. I do not know that he has been called on to stand trial there or anywhere else. So far as I have seen by the newspapers, the Judge-Advocate-General's Department decided that, he having been mustered out of the service, the War Department had no jurisdiction.

Mr. TILLMAN. So that there can not be any court-martial or trial of the man in any other way than in the forum of public opinion as to whether or not he did commit murder in the Philippines. Is that it?

Mr. PROCTOR. That seems to be the report of the Judge-Advocate-General's Department. I have no authority to speak on that point. I have understood that the question had been referred to the Attorney-General's Department by the War Department.

Mr. TILLMAN. In the absence of the other papers in the case affecting this officer's character and the charge made of murder, directly or indirectly—I know nothing about that—is it not a little premature to bring in his defense here, and to have an ex parte statement made of his confession or statement or whatever you may call it, before we get the accusation?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not think it is premature at all. Captain Brownell has been charged here on the floor this session and last session and in the public prints, and I do not consider it premature——

Mr. TILLMAN. Was the charge made?

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator's warm blood would have answered long before this if the charge had been made against an officer from the State of South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. The question of where the officer comes from does not enter here; the question is if he wears the American uniform or did wear it.

Mr. PROCTOR. He has worn it honorably and creditably always.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, we will take the Senator's statement as to that fact. I am always inclined to believe the Senator, because I do not think he would tell us anything he did not believe himself, though he might tell us something he did not know. I am merely speaking of the phenomenon here, of the strangeness, you might say the absurdity, of the situation, and, if the Senator is willing, I should like to know whether any investigation which may come about hereafter, or if the facts should leak out, as they sometimes do as to actions in the Philippines, that a murder should have been committed there and the officer discharged, whether such officer is amenable to any law anywhere, or whether those people have any redress whatsoever? I understand that we have denied them the protection of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court of the United States has sustained our action in denying them any rights under the Constitution. Therefore they are absolutely helpless and at our mercy.

In this case, as I understand it, here is an officer charged with murder in the Philippines. If he is innocent—and God knows I hope he is for the honor of the country—he ought to be able to prove it; but the other side ought to have an opportunity to present evidence going to show that he is not innocent. I contend that it is not exactly fair, from my point of view, to present here an ex parte defense, without having had the facts brought out in some criminal proceeding or in some indictment which would enable the prosecution to bring its case before the country and submit its evidence.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the question to which the Senator refers was, I believe, under consideration at the Department of Justice, but it is not a part of the matter which I propose to present. I propose to make a defense of Captain Brownell. In his position he was fully justified in taking any steps he saw proper for the safety of his command. Father Augustine might have been tried by a drumhead court-martial and shot or hung. I saw a man hung in our civil war, at very short notice indeed, for a much less violation of the rules of war than was committed in this case. This man was professing loyalty to our cause, and at the same time he was a leader in encouraging insurrection, collecting funds for it—collecting funds from the church, which was entirely contrary to the canons of his order.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I have only to say that for the honor of the American Republic and the honor of the American Army, I would to God Father Augustine had been shot by order of a drumhead court-martial rather than tortured to death to get the money from him, as this man himself confesses he did.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the prosecution of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont was assented to with the understanding that there would be very little discussion and that but a few moments would be occupied before the Senator from Vermont concluded. The indications are now that there is going to be a controversy which may be protracted endlessly, and therefore if the Senator will allow me, I should like to have him yield at this point so that the regular order, the statehood bill, may be proceeded with.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Pennsylvania will admit, I think, that I have not been solely responsible for the length of time which has been consumed; but I am entirely willing to yield to him.

Mr. QUAY. I do not wish to say, Mr. President, that either party is responsible. I merely state the fact that there is a controversy, and therefore I ask for the regular order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The statehood bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely wanted to remark, Mr. President, that if the Senator from Massachusetts is very anxious to begin the speech which he was too tired last night to begin—and I agree with him that it was not reasonable to ask him to go on then—I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to undertake to shut off debate that has grown out of the morning business and gone on ever since because the Senator from Vermont may have completed what he wished to say, and that others should be shut off practically by the Senator from Pennsylvania getting up and announcing that the statehood bill was before the Senate, and that he wanted somebody to talk on it. The Senator from Pennsylvania knows as well as anyone else here that Senators are not confined to the subject before the Senate if they want to discuss any measure, and I submit to him there ought to be the same latitude of discussion upon any subject before the Senate—recognizing that the statehood bill is the unfinished business—that usually obtains here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] is not now before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. We all understand that; but the Senator from Vermont was discussing the resolution of the Senator from Utah, or things appertaining to the resolution or mentioned in it, and I supposed that the rest of us who had something to say might say it while it was hot, rather than to wait until the morning, when, after we got started, it might run on all day.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I wish to say that I merely asked the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] to assent to this discussion going over until to-morrow, and I understood that he did assent. I did not desire to cut off the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do we understand that the Senator from Vermont will complete his defense of Captain Brownell in the morning, or is he through now?

Mr. PROCTOR. I will decide that hereafter.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right, sir.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 13679) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898;

A bill (H. R. 15069) granting an increase of pension to Daniel P. Marshall; and

A bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6595) fixing the times and places for holding regular terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed with amendment the following bills in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States; and

A bill (S. 3512) concerning minimum punishment in certain cases arising in the Indian Territory.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 14047) for the relief of the clerks of circuit and district courts of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 15331) to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. 15595) confirming and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Arkansas over certain lands formerly in the Fort Smith Reservation in said State, and asserting and retaining Federal jurisdiction over certain other lands in said reservation;

A bill (H. R. 16330) to detach the county of Dimmit from the southern judicial district of Texas and to attach it to the western judicial district of Texas;

A bill (H. R. 16333) to change and fix the time for holding district and circuit courts of the United States for the eastern division of the eastern district of Arkansas;

A bill (H. R. 16334) fixing terms of United States courts in Colorado, and other purposes;

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 6132) granting an increase of pension to Fannie McHarg;

A bill (H. R. 1193) to correct the military record of Henry M. Holmes;

A bill (H. R. 6467) granting an honorable discharge to Samuel Welch; and COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House bill 16333.

The bill (H. R. 16333) to change and fix the time for holding district and circuit courts of the United States for the eastern division of the eastern district of Arkansas was read twice by its title.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to state that a bill precisely similar, except that this one contains the words "that the act shall take effect from and after its passage," has already passed the Senate. This is a House bill containing only one section, and it is important that it should be passed now on account of the time fixed for holding the court. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered at this time.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas will move that the bill (S. 6719) to change and fix the time for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the eastern division of the eastern district of Arkansas be recalled from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BERRY. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill was passed.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 14047) for the relief of the clerks of circuit and district courts of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 15595) confirming and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Arkansas over certain lands formerly in the Fort Smith Reservation, in said State, and asserting and retaining Federal jurisdiction over certain other lands in said reservation;

A bill (H. R. 16330) to detach the county of Dimmit from the southern judicial district of Texas and to attach it to the western judicial district of Texas;

A bill (H. R. 16334) fixing terms of United States courts in Colorado, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 16599) amending chapter 591 of the United States Statutes at Large, Fifty-sixth Congress, approved May 26, 1900, entitled "An act to provide for the holding of a term of the circuit and district courts of the United States at Superior, Wis.;"

A bill (H. R. 16651) to fix the time for holding the United States district and circuit courts in the northern and middle districts of Alabama;

A bill (H. R. 16724) to provide for an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York; and

A bill (H. R. 16775) establishing United States courts at Duncan, Maryetta, and Comanche, Ind. T.

The bill (H. R. 15331) to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries in certain cases was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PUNISHMENT OF LARCENY IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3512) concerning minimum punishment in certain cases arising in the Indian Territory.

The amendments of the House were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any person, whether an Indian or otherwise, who shall hereafter be convicted in the Indian Territory of stealing any horse, mare, gelding, filly, foal, mule, ass, or jenny, or of stealing, or marking, killing, or wounding with intent to steal, any kind of cattle, pigs, hogs, sheep, or goats, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than fifteen years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed: Provided, however, That all such acts and parts of acts shall remain in force for the punishment of all persons who have heretofore been guilty in the Indian Territory of the offense or offenses herein mentioned: And provided further, That this act shall not affect or apply to any prosecution now pending or the prosecution of any offense already committed.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act fixing the punishment for the larceny of horses, cattle, and other live stock in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes."

Mr. HOAR. The amendment accomplishes the same purpose as the original bill. The present law makes various larcenies of cattle punishable by death, at any rate a very severe punishment, which the bill reduces. The House has merely changed the form of the bill. I think the amendments had better be agreed to without a reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HOAR, Mr. FAIRBANKS, and Mr. TURNER were appointed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it was my fortune to serve upon the committee on resolutions of the Republican national convention in 1896 at St. Louis. I was on the subcommittee which prepared the resolutions, and I remember very well the resolution in regard to the admission of the Territories. I think I drafted it or wrote it out myself. I am not perfectly confident as to my making the draft, but I am certain that the clause was carefully considered, and Senators will remember, as it has been frequently referred to here, that in that resolution it was stated that we were in favor of the admission of the Territories whenever Congress should consider them fit for statehood. I am stating the resolution broadly.

In 1900 a similar resolution was adopted at Philadelphia, omitting the specific clause in regard to the discretion of Congress. I do not think that that omission makes the slightest difference in regard to the meaning of the resolution. The qualifying clause was put in at St. Louis, out of an abundance of caution, and I do not think its omission at Philadelphia altered in the least the general intent of the committee on resolutions in either convention or the intent of the conventions themselves.

No man in either convention, Mr. President, would have thought for one moment of pledging himself to admit certain Territories into the Union as States without any regard to time or the form of the bill admitting them or the fitness of the Territories for statehood. We reserved, of course, all our liberty as members of the House or Senate in regard to these Territories. The resolution in the convention platforms was a mere general statement that the party favored the admission of the Territories at an early day. It was never made an issue in the campaign; it was never discussed before the convention, and there never was an attempt on the part of anyone to commit members of either House of Congress to the proposition that they were bound, as Republicans, to support the entrance of those Territories into the Union as States without any regard to their fitness, without any regard to time, to boundaries, or to anything else. Such a proposition, indeed, is absurd on its face.

I am as anxious, and I believe as conscientious, as anyone in my desire to live up to all the pledges of my party, but a general statement of the party in regard to the admission of certain Territories into the Union is not a pledge that we are to give our support without question or hesitation to any bill providing for statehood that happens to be brought into this Chamber. Nobody in a convention who had legislative responsibilities would assent for one moment to any resolution of that character.

The resolution adopted at Philadelphia does not bind any man to any time, to any specific measure, or to the admission of any specific Territory. What is to be thought of the proposition that a Senator of the United States has resigned his right of judgment on a measure like this because a resolution has been put into a platform without discussion, which is in itself a mere expression of general good will, and that then he is to be held up here and told that he is false to his party principles if he does not vote immediately for a bill which he has had no share in drafting and in regard to which notice has been served upon him that he can not even hope to amend it? No, Mr. President, I think that the proposition as to the binding effect of the resolution of the Republican national convention upon any member of the Republican party may as well be dismissed from this discussion. It can not be seriously made, still less seriously considered, by any sane and responsible man.

I am opposed to this bill on account of the time at which it is sought to pass it—in a short session, in the pressure of other business, with insufficient discussion, without what I conceive to be due opportunity to consider the most momentous legislation that can be brought before a Congress of the United States. I am opposed to the form of the bill, for in this bill are yoked together three totally different propositions. I shall have something further to say in regard to this phase of the question.

I am opposed to passing this bill at this time because it is an irrevocable bill. There is no maxim of more general application, none that we hear referred to more frequently, than the fact that one Congress can not bind another. It is rare, indeed, that a measure ever comes before Congress which, by its passage, puts it beyond the power of all future Congresses ever to change the decision then made; but on this bill, if it passes, there is no repeal. If this bill becomes law, there is no opportunity of retracing our steps. It has brought to my mind, as I thought of this feature in it, the old familiar schoolboy quotation from Virgil:

Facilis descensus Averni;
* * * * *
Sed revocare gradum superasque evadere ad auras,
Hoc opus, hic labor est.

The Trojan hero, Mr. President, was enabled, by sufficient labor and by the help of a goddess, to return to the upper air. There is no such opportunity given here to the Congress of the United States. If it once passes a bill admitting Territories to statehood, the Government of the United States resigns once for all its power over this territory which belongs to the United States; territory which was aquired either by the blood or the treasure of all the people of the United States. When we pass this bill, converting these Territories into States, we resign all our control such as we to-day possess over them as Territories. It is a very serious and a very important step, and, as I have said, it is absolutely irrevocable. Once taken, it can never be retraced. If we fail to admit a Territory as a State at a given time, it is always possible to remedy that error, if it be an error, in the years to come; but if we admit a Territory as a State into the Union we never can remedy it, no matter how grievous the mistake may be.

Mr. President, a bill of that character, a bill of that irrevocable nature deserves the utmost care and consideration on that account if on no other. Congress may feel with most laws that if error is found in them subsequently they are always open to repeal, even if repeal involves some little cost; but when you have taken Territories and made them States in this great Union, the act is done and nothing can ever undo it, no matter how unfit they may prove to be in the future. They may present to us a declining population; they may fall to a point where a single ward of a great city more than equals in population a State which sends two Senators to this body, and if that should prove to be so, yet the act can never be undone.

That quality alone of this bill, as it seems to me, Mr. President, commands us to treat it with greater care than we bring to the consideration of almost any legislation which comes before us. I think that that single quality in this bill is enough to justify those who oppose it in demanding that they shall have all the time possible if they think any portion of the proposed States unfit for statehood to persuade the Senate and to persuade the country of the justice of their contention.

I had intended at this point to go on with a discussion of the bill in a manner which I shall subsequently pursue. But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] in the very able and interesting speech which he made the other day in behalf of this bill—and he is always interesting and always forcible—brought forward an argument which, if it prevails and if it is sound, puts an end to this discussion at the very outset. He took the ground that, though not bound by the letter of the law to admit these Territories as States, we were bound morally to admit them now, and that the course of history and the general treatment accorded to these Territories constituted a moral contractual obligation.

Mr. President, if we are in any way bound by moral obligation to admit these Territories, it is useless to discuss the merits of the bill or the fitness of the Territories in question for statehood. We must submit to the moral obligation and, however much we may dislike it, we must carry out that which we have bound ourselves morally to do.

Mr. President, before coming to the bill itself I wish to examine that argument, which struck me at the time as one of very great importance and which it seems to me ought to be met by those who are opposed to the position of the Senator from Ohio and other Senators who support this bill.

All the territory involved in this bill, all the territory which it is proposed by this bill to make into States, was acquired by the United States by purchase or by conquest. Part of it was acquired by treaty with France in what was known as the Louisiana purchase. Part of it was acquired from the Republic of Mexico by the treaty of peace which brought to a close our war with Mexico, and a small portion was added by the subsequent convention known as the Gadsden treaty. It is therefore all territory which has been acquired by the United States.

Such being the historic fact, I wish now to call attention to the constitutional law laid down by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] on the subject of the acquisition of territory, in January, 1899, and in subsequent debates which arose in regard to the Philippine Islands.

I may say, before citing what he then said, that I most absolutely and entirely agree with his position, that I think it is beyond a doubt the sound one, and I am glad to read his statement of the doctrine, because it is better than any I could myself make.

In the course of his speech in regard to the acquisition of territory as suggested by the Philippine Islands, the Senator from Ohio said:

If any authority be needed, let me cite what Chief Justice Marshall said in the case of the American Insurance Company v. Canter, reported in 1 Peters, at page 511. The first paragraph of the syllabus reads as follows:

"The Constitution of the United States confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the power of making war and of making treaties; consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory either by conquest or by treaty."

The learned jurist states that proposition without any qualification as to consent, as to whether or not the people occupying the territory, and who are thus brought under our jurisdiction and laws, shall be consulted by us and shall signify their willingness to be governed by us before we can take jurisdiction.

The power to make war and the power to make treaties are two powers conferred absolutely without qualification, each power carrying with it the power, as Chief Justice Marshall says, to acquire territory. Then what does he say as to the right to govern territory after it has been acquired?

Mr. GRAY. I should like the Senator to read further from that case the sentence of Chief Justice Marshall in reference to the right to govern territory after it has been acquired, whether by treaty or otherwise.

Mr. FORAKER. I was just turning to it on page 542. After having discussed and announced the proposition as the law of the land, that under both these powers we have the power to acquire territory, and having a case before him which involved the discussion of that subject, he then takes up the question of the right and authority and power of the government that has acquired to govern the territory that has been acquired. I might read with interest a great deal that is said here, but I do not wish to unnecessarily trespass upon the time of the Senate. I therefore content myself with saying that at page 542 Chief Justice Marshall, after speaking of the constitutional power expressly conferred on the Congress to govern, says:

"The right to govern may be the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, again the Senator from Ohio said in the same debate:

What I am contending for just now is the power of the Government, without any qualification whatever, to annex, either by treaty or by war, any territory anywhere on the face of the globe that any other independent sovereignty could annex by war or by treaty. In other words, Mr. President, I am trying to assert that our fathers did not make a constitutional government inferior in rank and power in this respect to any other independent sovereignty of the earth.

Again, in the same debate, he said:

When it comes to the admission of a Territory as a State into the Union, Congress has to vote whether or not the State shall be admitted; and when the State comes with a constitution that is consonant with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States, and the other conditions are favorable, Congress may say to the State, "Come in," or Congress may say to the State, "Stay out."

Even when conditions are favorable and the Constitution is consonant with that of the Union, we may still say, "Stay out."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As I understand, the Senator from Ohio there makes the point that it is not a right.

Mr. LODGE. I will come to that in a moment. I should like to complete my statement, and then I will come to it.

Again, on the same day and in the same debate, the Senator from Ohio said:

The Senator from Missouri then concludes that because of the reading of the text of the Constitution when so arranged it is clear to every intelligent layman that it was intended by the framers of the Constitution that no territory should be acquired except only with the present intention of ultimately making it a State.

Mr. President, the whole of that argument, it seems to me, falls to the ground when we reverse the order and read it, not as the Senator has read it, but as the framers of the Constitution read it. They chose the order; and when you restore the proper order, the order in which they placed these provisions, no such deduction can be rightfully made as that which the Senator from Missouri has made.

The deduction of the Senator from Missouri being that it could only be taken with the ultimate purpose of making a State.

And again, a little further on, the Senator from Ohio said:

The second of these propositions, that territory can be acquired only with a view to ultimately making it a State, is one that I have already answered in what I have said as to the power of the Government under the war-making and the treaty-making power to acquire territory and in the citations of authority that I have made.

Those, Mr. President, are the extremely well-stated views, as the Senate will perceive, of the Senator from Ohio, in 1899. In 1900, a year later, he said:

I do want to say, however, before passing to that which I have it especially in mind to say, that with respect to his remarks in regard to the Dred Scott case, all that was gone over fully in the last Congress; and, in answer to a speech somewhat like that which he has just now made, in respect to that decision, it was then pointed out that all the judges of that court did not agree with Chief Justice Taney in his declaration of his opinion that territory could be acquired by the United States only for the purposes of ultimate statehood; that a present purpose of statehood must accompany the acquisition.

It was pointed out at that time, by, I think, a very careful analysis of that case, that instead of the other judges agreeing with Chief Justice Taney in that respect not one single member of that court agreed with him in that regard, unless it was Mr. Justice Wayne. There is some ground for supposing that he was in accord with the Chief Justice, but there is not a line, I undertake to say, in the decision of any one of the other members of the court that will warrant any such claim. If there is I have not been able to find it.

Without stopping to read other authorities to the same effect, I shall content myself with saying that all the authorities of the Supreme Court, where the question has been directly under consideration, have recognized the fact that there is the United States proper, composed of the Union, for which the Constitution is the organic law, and territory outside of the Union, simply belonging to the United States, which it is the province of Congress to govern as the Congress may see fit to govern it. Mr. Justice Bradley characterizes these outside Territories as mere dependencies. He was speaking of Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, etc. If they are mere dependencies, much more are our recent acquisitions only dependencies.

Ordinarily, almost without exception, heretofore, in governing this outside territory, we have extended the Constitution as one of the first laws of the Territory; and having thus extended the Constitution, and having made it to apply there, we have taken that as our rule of action, and it has obtained as the organic law in that way, but in no other way.

There, Mr. President, very ably and lucidly laid down, are the propositions that the United States can acquire territory; that it can take possession of territory; that having acquired and taken possession of territory it can govern it as it pleases; that it is not bound to admit such Territory as a State at any given time, and that it is not limited to taking territory with the ultimate purpose of making it into States. It may take it with any purpose it chooses—the fact of the ultimate purpose of statehood is not necessary to the acquisition—and the only thing that could modify the absolute control of the United States in regard to the disposition of the territory is that "a present purpose of statehood must accompany the acquisition." That last statement seems to me very admirable in its exactness—"present purpose of statehood must accompany the acquisition."

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has complimented me so highly in quoting at such great length from the remarks I have made on other occasions in the Senate on this general subject that I am loath to interrupt him to call his attention to what seems to have escaped him.

The propositions I laid down were two as to the acquisition of territory: first, that territory might be acquired by conquest in the exercise of the war-making power; secondly, that territory might be acquired by treaty. What I said afterwards had reference to territory with respect to which we were at liberty to deal, so far as our own obligations were concerned, as we might see fit, and did not have reference to the case where we had acquired it by a treaty containing a stipulation which obligated us to admit the inhabitants of that territory into the Union.

What I was talking about in connection with New Mexico was that it was acquired by treaty, at the close of the war it is true, but it was not acquired by conquest, except only in the sense that the conquest had gone before. We did not conquer it and simply take it and hold on to it, to do with it as we saw fit, but at the close of the war, in settlement of all differences between Mexico and the United States, we entered into a treaty of peace, one condition and stipulation of which was that we should acquire this territory which was by that treaty ceded to us, and that with respect to the inhabitants of that territory we should be bound to do certain things. One of those things was to admit them, in the way to which I called attention at the time, into the Union of the United States, in accordance with the principles of our Constitution. I am not trying to quote the language with entire accuracy.

Now, what I contended for was that the rule which had been established as to territory acquired from Spain and from France, accompanied with similar stipulations, should apply to New Mexico, notwithstanding the fact that there was a parenthetical modifying clause which invested Congress specifically with power to judge as to the time when this Territory should be admitted to statehood. I contended for that, the Senator from Massachusetts will remember, on the ground I undertook to present, that by the contemporaneous expressions of Presidents of the United States it was shown to have been the intention at the time when New Mexico was acquired to admit at an early period the inhabitants of that Territory to statehood, just as we did at an early period admit the inhabitants of California and other portions of that country to statehood.

The contention I made as to moral obligation was that although we were not in a strict legal sense bound, because of the saving effect of the parenthetical clause, yet we were morally bound, when I showed from contemporaneous history that it was the understanding of everybody who represented us in connection with the transaction that the parenthetical clause should not establish a different rule as to New Mexico from that which had been established as to this other Territory.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indulge me just a moment longer?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I was talking about the acquisition of territory that came to us at the close of the war with Spain, which came without any such obligation on our part. The treaty under which we acquired the Philippines and Porto Rico and Guam expressly provided not that the inhabitants of those Territories should at some time be admitted into the Union, according to the principles of the Constitution, as was the case in the treaties with France and Mexico and Spain, but that the Congress of the United States should fix the civil and political status of those inhabitants, which was a clear declaration that Congress should do with the matter as it might see fit, and that our Government, in taking that territory under that treaty, was under no obligation, except only to use its best judgment with respect to how it should be governed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, simply restates what I have read from his previous speeches. I think I stated the position correctly—it is my own—in regard to the acquisition of territory. I do not think we differ at all. It is that we have the right to acquire territory; we have the right to govern it, and ultimate purpose of statehood is not necessary in the acquisition of territory. The only thing that can modify it is, to use the language of the Senator from Ohio, a present purpose of statehood accompanying the acquisition.

Now, those being, as I conceive, the correct principles in regard to the acquisition of territory, it remains to be seen whether, having acquired this territory (I think the language of the Supreme Court in regard to the territory acquired from Mexico was that it was acquired by conquest and purchase), there is anything which binds us to admit that territory as one or more States at any particular time.

The first territory which may be said to have been acquired and made into States was that covered by the ordinance of 1787. There is no need of my reading that. It of course provided for the entrance of these Territories as States into the Union. It fixed the terms on which they should come in, the population and other conditions. The territory was acquired by the United States from the several States, and it was not acquired either by war or by treaty, by conquest or by purchase.

The next acquisition was that from France of the territory known as Louisiana. The article which refers to the matter of statehood in that treaty is article 3:

> The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States.

Now, there was a direct promise to admit that ceded territory into the Union as States.

Has anyone ever suggested that there was any moral obligation upon the United States to admit under that clause any portion of that territory at any given time?

Mr. President, in the bill before us there is a portion of the Louisiana territory now seeking admission to the Union. An entire century has elapsed since the treaty was made which gave us that territory. The article was made elastic. It says "admitted as soon as possible." Who is to judge? Who can be the judge? Only the Congress. Has there been any moral obligation, or any obligation of any kind upon us to admit any portion of that territory at any given time? The very fact that a century has elapsed and we have not yet completed the admission of the Louisiana territory in the form of States is an answer to that proposition.

The next acquisition was that of Florida. Article 6 of the treaty with Spain provides that—

> The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution.

Again a latitude was left by the phrase "as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution." But neither in the case of Louisiana nor of Florida was there any obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to admit any portion of them at any given time. And yet, Mr. President, I think it will be found as we examine those treaties further that those are the strongest clauses in any treaty for the acquisition of territory.

In regard to the territory which was settled to be ours on the Northwestern boundary, the title of the territory rested on exploration and discovery, and the treaty which settled it said nothing in regard to any future disposition of the territory.

In 1867 we made a treaty with Russia for the purchase of Alaska. In regard to that Territory, no statement whatever was made as to a purpose of statehood or its admission into the Union as a State. The clause in the Russian treaty applied only to citizens.

We then have the island of Tutuila, one of the Samoan group, which was set off to us under a convention between the United States, Germany, and Great Britain in December, 1899. There is nothing in that treaty in regard to statehood or in the preceding treaty, known as the treaty of Berlin.

The treaty of peace with Spain, by which we acquired Porto Rico and the Philippines, contains the well-known clause which has been so often referred to in this body:

> The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by Congress.

Now, it will be observed, Mr. President, that in all the treaties I have cited since the Louisiana and Florida treaties there is no agreement as to statehood, and in the treaty with Spain there is a definite clause as to the determination by Congress of the civil and political rights of the inhabitants.

Yet, after all, Mr. President, there is nothing in any of these treaties that alters the power of the United States, on the theory laid down by the Senator from Ohio, to deal with territory, unless there is some clause affecting their present acquisition. The Louisiana and Florida treaties went further in this direction than any others, and yet they left us absolutely free to determine at what time the promise of ultimate statehood should be carried into effect. I now come to the treaties with Mexico, involving the rest of the territory covered by this bill. In the case of Louisiana and Florida the statement of the treaties was that we would agree to admit the territory as States as soon as possible, or whenever consistent with the principles of the Federal Government. That bound us to an ultimate gift of statehood, but was construed, as a matter of course, to mean that we could admit to statehood when in our judgment it was possible or consistent with the principles of the Federal Government.

Now, as to the treaty with Mexico:

> Article IX. The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, "according to the principles of the Constitution"

There, Mr. President, is the only treaty in which it is specifically set forth that it shall be left to the judgment of Congress when they shall be incorporated into the Union. In all the other treaties where ultimate statehood is promised the time of performance is left to the judgment of Congress by obvious and unquestioned inference. Here it is set forth in words.

A much better claim could be made that we were under a moral obligation to the inhabitants of Louisiana Territory, portions of which we have admitted from time to time. An equally good claim could be made in regard to Alaska, where there is no provision as to ultimate statehood at all. Alaska has a population of 63,000 whites, very nearly as large as the white population of Arizona. Yet, no one would think of claiming that there was any moral obligation upon us to admit Alaska. Nevertheless, there is just as much moral obligation, in my judgment, to admit Alaska as there is to admit these Mexican Territories. In fact, it seems to me that there is more, for unless language has lost its force the words "at the proper time, to be judged of by the Congress of the United States," leave it absolutely within the power of the Congress of the United States to judge of the time.

The statement is there made in a solemn treaty. What does it matter what the opinion of a President or of a Senator or of a member of the House or of anybody else may be, there it is stipulated in the treaty explicitly that these Territories shall be admitted at the time, and only at the time, which, in the judgment of Congress, is proper. That is a solemn pact between the nations, and you can not "rail the seal from off that bond." We must be, we can only be, guided by the language of the treaty, and the treaty says implicitly that these Territories are to be admitted when Congress judges proper to admit them.

Now, in the presence of that specific statement, Mr. President, in view of the language of all the treaties which I have cited and of all the principles laid down so clearly and so soundly by the Senator from Ohio himself, I contend that not only there is absolutely no moral obligation and no moral argument in behalf of statehood, but that we have an absolute contractual right to say in regard to the Territory acquired from Mexico when, in our judgment, it is proper for it to come into the Union.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A very little of the time while the Senator has been speaking I have been called out of the Chamber. I understood the Senator to be just now quoting from the treaty with Mexico concerning these two Territories. I wish to ask the Senator what the fact is as to whether that peculiar and significant language was ever used in any treaty before that time?

Mr. LODGE. It was not only never used in any treaty before that time, but it never has been used in any treaty for the acquisition of territory since.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the point which suggested itself to my mind, and which probably the Senator has already brought out, was that there must be some particular and specific reason why our Government in making this treaty should use language never used before in any like treaty; that it should specifically provide that the territory should be admitted at the proper time, and then should provide that that proper time should be judged of by Congress. That is to say, the proper time to be judged of by Congress could easily be inferred, if it had not been put in here; but they went so far as to actually write it down in words. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to that particular fact, that here in this treaty, unlike any treaty that ever went before or afterwards, words were used which might readily have been implied—that is, that Congress was the sole judge.

Now, what I am calling the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts and also the Senator from Ohio to is, Why was it thought necessary to use language in this treaty never used in any treaty before or since, and also language which might readily have been inferred? Why did Congress do the unusual thing, and apparently the unnecessary thing, of putting in the express words "at the proper time to be judged of by the Congress of the United States?" Did Congress see that there might be an effort made to admit them before the proper time, and that some claim of right might be made, and therefore did Congress take care of that in this specific language?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it is very obvious from a comparison of the different treaties that that language was put in with a purpose. This territory which we acquired from Mexico differed in an important respect from almost all the territory we had acquired before. The vast regions occupied by Louisiana were for the most part populated only by wandering tribes of Indians. From 30,000 to 50,000 people—French, Spanish, American, and English—were congregated near the mouth of the Mississippi, in what is now the State of Louisiana, but the rest of the acquisition was practically a wilderness. The same was true of Florida.

But a portion of the territory which we acquired from Mexico was populated. There were some 60,000 people living within what is now the Territory of New Mexico at the time of the acquisition—a considerable population. They were not newcomers. They had not suddenly poured into that region from other parts of North America as the men of the United States advanced into what is now Texas. They were among the oldest inhabitants of the continent of European descent. They had been there for many generations. They were an established population.

Mr. President, when the negotiators of that treaty were making it and came to this clause, which had been agreed to in substance both in the Florida treaty and the Louisiana treaty, in view of that population, long planted on the soil, of a different race and a different language from those of the people of the nation, it is not surprising that, foreseeing a possible early agitation for the admission of that region to statehood, the negotiators, out of an abundance of caution, for I do not think it was in the least necessary, put in this specific provision that that territory should not be admitted until such time as Congress deemed proper.

They put the power of judgment wholly in the hands of Congress. It seems to me that it is impossible to argue that there is any moral obligation in the utterances of Presidents or anyone else which rises superior to a treaty solemnly made between the representatives of two nations and solemnly agreed to by the President and the Senate of the United States. I do not think that the utmost ingenuity can show that there is anything anywhere in the nature of moral obligation which deprives us of the right of judging upon its merits this bill and that which it proposes to do.

I come, therefore, Mr. President, to the bill itself. It proposes to admit into the Union three new States, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona. I alluded at the opening of my argument to the importance of this measure. What indeed can be more important to the people of the United States than the admission of new States. In the progress of years this sovereign act has become steadily more important, for each State helps to govern all the other States of the Union. When I vote here to admit a new State into the Union of States, I to that extent diminish the weight of my own State in the Senate. To that extent I share the power which my own State now has with newcomers. I place on an equality with my own State a new and untried community. My first responsibility here is to the people of the United States and next to the people of my own State. My responsibility to the people of the Territories is wholly secondary.

I think, Mr. President, that the argument for statehood for these Territories has been greatly distorted when the attempt has been made to show that this is a question concerning solely those people who inhabit the region which it is proposed to make into States. They are only one party, and the most unimportant party, to this contract. They are the people who make the great gain, it is true, if this bill becomes a law, but they are not the people first to be considered.

We have heard a great deal, and a great many zealous and eloquent appeals have been made, in behalf of the "builders of waste places." The phrase perhaps has become a trifle musty. But there is much more to be said for the people who have built States already, for the people who laid the foundations of the Commonwealths, without which there never would have been a United States. Their interests are at stake here quite as much as anyone else's, and their interests are larger than anyone else's. The interests of the 45 existing States must be first considered, and then, if you please, the interests of the people who come and ask for admission to the Union. The burden of proof is not upon us. The burden of proof rests upon those who are demanding admission to this great Union of States. They will help to govern us, if they are admitted here, and I think we have a right to say something about who shall govern us. It is a pretty important matter to the people of all the States as to who shall govern them, and we are proposing in this bill to admit some new rulers for the United States who are to take a part not in governing Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, but in governing all the States of the Union. We have a right to question their credentials pretty closely before we admit them to that great partnership.

In the early days the responsibilities in the admission of new States were not so great as they are now. The nation in which they became partners was by no means so large. The United States was not so great, the prizes before the nation were not so brilliant nor the interests so far-reaching. We admit them now, if we admit them, as partners in a great partnership. The wealth of the early States which formed the Union would be but a trifle on the ledger of a single State to-day. The interests of 1789 were very small and very narrow compared to the interests committed to this body and to the House of Representatives at the present time.

Not long ago a Senator who has done me the honor of listening to me, and who had been out of the Senate for a brief period and then returned to it—I think the interval was only of four years—said, "You probably do not realize, having been here continuously, how much the business of the United States has increased in four years. I notice it, coming back to it after an absence."

If that can be justly said of four years, Mr. President, think what the increase has been since the early days when the United States consisted of the thirteen little scattered Commonwealths on the border of the Atlantic Ocean. Then when we admitted a new State, we admitted it to the possibilities of a great future. Now when we admit a new State, we admit it to a great accomplished past, to a splendid present, to a future of wider possibilities than the founders of the country ever dared even to dream of.

The Government of the United States, as formed under the Constitution, rests on the great compromise, on the great arrangement which placed the basis of representation in one House upon population and in the other House upon the States. That arrangement, known in history as the Connecticut compromise, was the corner-stone of the Constitution of the United States. Without it that Constitution never could have come into being. If it had, it would have died at the very start. It is that balance between the representation of population and the representation of the States as political entities which has made this Government the success it has been. It is that, and that alone, which has made the Senate of the United States the only successful and powerful upper chamber in all the history of parliaments. It all rests, Mr. President, on that one theory of the balance between the States and the population.

It is not wise, Mr. President, to do anything which shall disturb that balance. We have gone too far in that direction, in my opinion, already. We must beware of creating too great a disparity between the population and the State. We want in this Chamber, where every State votes equally, to have some reasonable equality in the power, the population, and the weight of the State, in the House and in the Government.

I think, Mr. President, it is not well to bring home too often to the people of the United States the glaring contrast between a State which is the equal of New York in the Senate, but which sends 1 Representative to the House of Representatives against 36 from the great Empire State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I have listened with more than ordinary interest to what the Senator has had to say, and I rose to suggest the absence of a quorum. I have noticed that hardly any Senator who supports the omnibus bill is here or has been here to hear the Senator's unanswerable argument on a very important point. It is one of the most important arguments which have been made, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. FORAKER. I call attention to the fact that there are more Senators who support the omnibus bill in the Chamber than there are Senators who are opposing it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to go on record as denying that contention.

Mr. FORAKER. I make profert of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, I make profert of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Alger,	Dillingham,	Kean,	Quarles,
Berry,	Dolliver,	Kittredge,	Quay,
Beveridge,	Dryden,	Lodge,	Scott,
Blackburn,	Dubois,	McEnery,	Simmons,
Burnham,	Foraker,	Mallory,	Simon,
Burrows,	Foster, Wash.	Martin,	Stewart,
Burton,	Frye,	Millard,	Turner,
Carmack,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Vest,
Clark, Wyo.	Gamble,	Nelson,	Warren,
Clay,	Hanna,	Penrose,	Wellington.
Culberson,	Hansbrough,	Platt, Conn.
Cullom,	Heitfeld,	Platt, N. Y.
Daniel,	Hoar,	Proctor,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names on the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that in suggesting the absence of a quorum, I exercised merely my constitutional right, and that that act requires no explanation as a matter of law; yet I desire to say at this juncture that that was not done to inconvenience Senators, but during the very able address of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the unanswerable argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, on one phase of this matter, which he has now concluded, I could not help but observe, nor could others help but observe, that very few Senators who support the omnibus bill were here to hear him.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I am prepared to say that there were upon this side of the Chamber more opponents of the views of the Senator from Massachusetts than of those who favor them who were listening to his speech. There is no question of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That statement of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON]—welcome, as any statement which he makes always is—does not have even the force of novelty, for it had just been made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. The Senator from Ohio further stated that he was willing to make profert and I said I was willing to make profert. I think I am fairly well informed about the attitude of almost all the Senators who were here; but whether it is true or not that more of one side or of the other side were here, it nevertheless is true that not only the majority, but the very great majority, of those who are claimed as favoring this measure were not here.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio the other day made an argument upon the rule to be deduced from the treaties concerning the acquisition of territory—a speech of great ability, which impressed the Senate and the individual members thereof, and the Senator from Massachusetts proceeded to answer that argument to-day so completely that his argument amounted to a demonstration. Even when the Senator from Ohio was appealed to, when his attention was directly called to that, he made no defense. Now, I submit if it is true that the argument of the Senator from Ohio the other day made an impression upon the Senate—and who will deny it?—that it is nothing more than just that those who were thus impressed should be here to listen to its refutation. Therefore, Mr. President, I say it was not a matter of vexation, but a measure of simple justice to all Senators who are making up their minds and whose minds are not already concluded without argument, that they should be here to hear that argument.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts has concluded that one phase of his argument and is proceeding to another, and, assuming that his demonstration upon his next point would be as conclusive as his demonstration upon the first point, I called for a quorum. Senators must understand that it was not done in any wise to incommode Senators, but merely that Senators should hear the refutation of the excellent argument made by the Senator from Ohio, to which we listened with such attention and with which we were all so well impressed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I am through.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to ask the Senator from Indiana why he does not exercise his constitutional right of calling a quorum, and do it, as the rest of us do, without lecturing the Senate? [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has injected many medical terms into this debate, always to our instruction and usually to our amusement; but the Senator can not say, however much the Senator may indulge in that, that I have indulged in any lecture of the Senate. I do stand here, however, to say that as a Senator in charge of this bill, representing the Committee on Territories, when as perfect an argument as the Senator from Massachusetts has made in direct answer to the able argument of the Senator from Ohio, which I say impressed us all, it was only reasonable that I should take such measures as might be needful to see that Senators who heard the argument of the Senator from Ohio should also hear its answer by the Senator from Massachusetts. In doing that I am not assuming to lecture the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it has occurred to him that possibly the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts does not care to have it advertised to the country that nobody is listening to his very able argument? [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know what has occurred to the Senator from Massachusetts, but I am sure, whether anything has occurred to the Senator from Massachusetts or not, the Senator from New Hampshire will imagine it as having occurred and so state it. So we are in no danger of losing anything that the Senator from Massachusetts might have imagined, because we can be sure we can have it direct from the lips of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, of course that is an assumption that has no foundation in fact.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Perhaps that is so.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is absolutely so, and if I choose to make an observation concerning the only thing I have said on this bill, and state the exact facts about it, perhaps it would not redound to the credit of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It might not, Mr. President. I have no doubt, so far as that is concerned, that we might all indulge in opinions here—and statements of facts, too—more or less disagreeable to each other; but that is something, however, which thus far in this debate I have particularly and with care and watchfulness, so far as I am concerned, kept out of this debate. The Senator from New Hampshire is the first Senator I have heard inject anything of that kind into the debate.

Mr. HOAR. What is the regular order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is known as the statehood bill is the regular order before the Senate, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been, of course, interested in the discussion over the numbers of my audience, but although I can not convert all those who have votes upon this bill to my side, I have a sufficient number of attentive auditors, to whom I am very grateful, without being obliged to fill the chairs on the floor by compulsion or otherwise. If I can not draw them into the Chamber by the charm of my eloquence, I am quite content that Senators shall enjoy themselves elsewhere.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I think it is due to the Senator to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUARLES in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it is due to the Senator from Massachusetts that it should go into the RECORD that the Senators who are absent from the Chamber are not absent entirely of choice, but they are almost altogether absent engaged on committee work and attending to their duties as Senators elsewhere. I am sure all Senators would be glad to stay here and listen to the Senator from Massachusetts if it were not that they were called away by duties quite as imperative as they conceive to be the duty of sitting here.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Ohio knows that I understand that perfectly, and that I am entirely content, as I have said, with my audience, although they can not all vote.

I was speaking of the importance of a bill of this kind to the vast interests and great population of certain States, and of the equal importance of keeping in some measure that balance between the population and the States which lies at the basis of our Constitution.

In this connection, Mr. President, when this argument as to the importance of this matter has been brought before the Senate, as it has been very ably by other Senators, I have heard it repeated more than once—and the same statement will be found in the reports of the minority—that we have admitted new States into this Union in the past with very small populations, with fewer claims to entrance than the present applicants possess, and the fact that we have done so seems to be advanced as a conclusive argument that it is right to do it again.

Mr. President, recklessness in the past in matters of this importance is no argument for recklessness in the present—it never is in regard to any legislation—and it certainly can not be in regard to legislation of such moment as that of a bill to admit new States.

We attempt to throw around the admission of a single immigrant into this country safeguards to protect the citizenship of the United States as well as their health and general welfare. Those safeguards are, to my mind, very insufficient; but the attempt to guard the people of the United States in regard to the admission of immigrants is a well-established policy in our legislation. We have also thrown safeguards around citizenship itself. We require certain formalities, certain conditions, before we admit a man to citizenship in the United States. If the law is properly administered, he is to be asked certain questions to discover whether he possesses the necessary qualifications. The laws in regard to naturalization, in my opinion, like the laws in regard to immigration, are insufficient, and could be greatly improved and infinitely better enforced. But, nevertheless, both laws show that it is the intent of the Government, and must be always the intent of a government where every man of a certain age forms a part of the governing power, to protect their citizenship.

If it is important, then, that one man should have proper qualifications, first, to settle in the country, and second, to become part of its citizenship, what shall be said of the importance of admitting an entire community, many thousands of men at one stroke, to the citizenship of the United States, and admitting them, not merely to citizenship, not merely to a vote, but admitting them to representation and to power as an integral part of the Government of the United States? No, Mr. President, the fact that we have been careless in our immigration laws and that they are insufficient is no argument why we should not be more careful to-day. The fact that our naturalization laws are not properly enforced in many places is no reason why they should not be well enforced. The fact that we have been careless in the past and have admitted new States very easily and heedlessly is no argument that we should be careless and incautious to-day. On the contrary, every argument makes in one direction, that our care and our caution in the admission of new States should become greater and more minute as the years pass by, because with every passing year the estate to which we admit these new partners becomes greater, the heritage in which they are to share grows nobler and richer.

This argument loses none of its force from the fact that the Territory now involved is the last Territory within the old borders of the United States which is capable of admission to statehood. We have other vast Territories which belong to the United States. We have the district of Alaska, growing in poplation and in wealth. We must be very careful how we set precedents here in regard to these Territories if we remember that vast region of the Northwest which may before many years come knocking at the doors. We do not wish to put ourselves in the position where we shall be unable to say, in view of our previous action, "We do not think that your conditions are such as to justify statehood." We do not wish to put ourselves in such a position that we can not say to them, "There is something more than numbers or area to be considered; there is the fitness of the people, their situation, and their geographical relation to the rest of the United States."

Let us beware, for here we are not merely closing a long list of admitted Territories, but we are continuing a process; we are making a precedent. We should not forget that here in the Atlantic Ocean we have acquired an island with a population at least three times greater to-day than the population of New Mexico and Arizona put together. If we are careless in the principles we lay down now in regard to these Territories, that island may come and say, "You must admit us, for you have admitted Territories without regard to the quality of population, and in numbers we far surpass those which you have already let in."

We must take into consideration the fact that in the Pacific are the Hawaiian Islands, fit in population to come into the Union of States, long under American influences, with American schools, American churches, and the language of the United States. They may come to our doors before many years have passed, and we want to be very careful before we lay down as a principle that we have not the most absolute right to pass upon every condition surrounding a new Territory. It is not enough to say: "You have belonged to the United States so long, you count up in the tale so many men, and, therefore, you have a right to come in." We must hold firmly to the position that we have a right to say to the communities who come and demand this great privilege. "It is not enough that you should have a population which is equal to that of a Congressional district, for we have the right to ask of you, you applicants for this highest of privileges, whether in your general structure of society, in your language, in your schools, in your prospects, in your business, in your geographical situation you have a just claim to come in, and whether it is for our interest—not your interest, but the interest of the United States—to admit you as a State of the Union."

If we say to the people of New Mexico: "It is no matter whether you speak English or whether you speak Spanish," can we turn around to the people of Porto Rico and say: "You can not come into this Union until you have become an English-speaking people?" We must beware in admitting new Territories what precedents we establish, for we have acquired in these last few years new and distant territories, and we ought to exercise now more than ever before the utmost caution in proceeding with the admission of any region as a State of the Union. The precedent we set is more important to-day, in my opinion, than it has ever been and deserves a more thorough consideration for this reason, if for no other.

Mr. President, a word now as to the structure of this bill. It is what is known as an omnibus bill. I think the form, as a rule, an extremely bad one for any legislation. It has been used in Congressional practice hitherto for the purpose of passing claims, where it is not unreasonable, although even then not free from objection. Congress, instead of struggling at odd moments with individual claims, has finally adopted the practice of putting at intervals, say every two years, into one bill the claims which have stood fire the longest and been passed oftenest by the two Houses without final agreement, and then enacting them all as one measure. I am not sure, as I have said, that this is a particularly good method, even with claims. I think, perhaps, it is better than the old method, and possibly it is the only practicable method; but to treat a proposed State of the Union as if it had no greater importance than a claim for a burned cotton bale, to be jumbled in with another State, totally different, perhaps, in everything that constitutes a State, to put them all together and then ask us to vote on them in that way, seems to me the worst method which could be devised.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. QUAY. My recollection is—I may be mistaken, and if so the Senator from Massachusetts can correct me—that the Dakotas and Idaho were all admitted in one bill.

Mr. LODGE. They were, I think, and it was a miserable way to do it.

Mr. QUAY. Did not the Senator support that bill?

Mr. LODGE. If I was in Congress at the time, I probably did.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me, in answer to that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. I desire to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania—and then I will allow the Senator from Indiana to answer him—that if I voted for such a conglomerate bill in the past I learned something from my mistake. Those were not votes I was pleased with at the time; those were not methods of legislation which I liked. Those Territories came in as States, as is well known, in two groups, and they came in on two bills, owing to party compromises. I thought then it was a bad method. Now I am more than ever convinced that it was a bad method.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely wanted to say that if the Senator from Pennsylvania thought there was anything in the attempt to convict the Senator from Massachusetts of having supported an omnibus bill before, it might be readily set off by the fact that there are now Senators in this Chamber and members of the other House who opposed that bill very vigorously who are now supporting this bill as a matter of right. So if the Senator makes that point, we file the counter claim.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think that that method of legislating for statehood is a very bad one, and the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania is an illustration of what I was saying a few minutes ago. It is the argument that we have been reckless in the past, therefore it is a good thing to be reckless in the present; because we have admitted States by a bad method in the past, therefore it is a good thing to do it now. As I remember, the bills to which the Senator from Pennsylvania referred were made up in a way to satisfy party exigencies. It was an agreement, I think, between the parties—"If you will let in one State, we will let in another." I do not think political reasons of that sort are a good ground for letting in States. Still less do I think it a good way to let in a State when it has not even the excuse of a political agreement.

An omnibus bill is intended and put together, of course, for the purpose of concentrating as many votes as may be. One of the definitions of the word "omnibus," as my colleague reminds me, as found in the dictionary, is that of "catch-all," and I suppose possibly that that is the principal advantage, if not the only advantage, of this bill in its present form—that it catches all the votes possible for the admission of these Territories to statehood.

Mr. President, in dealing with several States one State may be fit and another State may not be fit; one State may have every qualification to come into the Union and another may have none. You yoke them together in this way and try to float through the weak case on the back of the strong one. It is exactly as if in naturalizing aliens we should ordain that if they brought up a batch of five men, and made a good case for one, we would then admit all five, merely because that one man was fit for naturalization. Suppose we were asked to naturalize men in groups. Everybody would regard it as preposterous. We naturalize only one man at a time. We admit men to citizenship singly; but when it comes to admitting a community to citizenship, to admitting a new State, on this floor they are not to be judged singly, but we must run through three of them at once.

Now, Mr. President, that is not all in regard to the structure of this bill. It is understood that no amendment is to be allowed; that all amendments are to be voted down. The substitute was withdrawn as an amendment, because it was understood, as I am informed by the committee, that if it was pending, a motion would be made to lay it on the table.

Mr. President, in the ten years I have been in the Senate I have never seen a motion made to lay a substitute bill on the table—one offered in good faith. The motion to lay on the table——

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the Senator permit me for just a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I think possibly the Senator is mistaken concerning the manner of the withdrawal of the substitute. I understood the committee had withdrawn it for the purpose of perfecting it. That was the statement of one of the gentlemen of the committee, as I understood him. It was not because there was any danger of a motion of the kind stated, but because the committee desired to add to it and make it perfect.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. If that is the reason——

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. If the committee withdrew it for the purpose of perfecting it, being a member of the committee, I have heard nothing of any attempt to perfect it up to this day. I do not think, and if I am in error the Senator from Indiana will correct me—I do not see him in the Chamber at the moment—that the committee has ever met from the day the substitute was reported.

Mr. LODGE. I may be mistaken; I am not a member of the committee; I am not speaking with any authority; but my understanding was that if the substitute had been moved, the motion would immediately have been made to lay it on the table. Now, the motion to lay on the table——

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator will permit me, I can probably explain that. I think there is some truth in what the Senator says. It has this basis of truth, that there was discussed the question of taking possession of the substitute, not with the intention of cutting off debate, but of introducing a motion to lay on the table, and then permitting debate by unanimous consent until in the judgment of the majority of the Senate the time for the cloture had arrived. That was discussed. There was no declaration with respect to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania confirms the information I had. The motion to lay on the table was of course placed in the rules in order to cut off or to limit in some degree the power of offering trivial, time-wasting amendments. It is used sometimes—I have seen it so used—on a measure like a tariff bill, where there is a great multitude of amendments and the debate has run on for a long time on one amendment. The motion to lay on the table is then made to cut off debate on that amendment. But this is a different case. The committee bring in one bill, and the minority of the committee offer a substitute. That substitute ought to be before the Senate. We ought to have the opportunity, the universal, parliamentary opportunity, to perfect both the substitute and the bill before they are brought to a vote. We can not get a vote on the substitute until we have had an opportunity to perfect it, and we can not have any opportunity now to offer an amendment to the substitute because it can not be moved until the last moment when we are ready to come to a vote. No amendment, no matter what it is, is to be allowed to the pending bill. We have to take this great bill, creating three States in the American Union, as it came from the House, without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i." It is the greatest surrender of the functions of the Senate on a bill of that kind that ever was proposed. Does anyone suppose that a bill like that can come out of the House absolutely perfect and that we are not to be allowed to change a word or a line in it?

I understand that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] desires to offer an amendment affecting the name of one of the Territories. I am not sure whether I agree with that proposition or not. But it seems to me it is a very reasonable proposition and one that we ought to consider. I am perfectly certain that we ought to change the name of the Territory of New Mexico, if we are going to admit it. I think to admit as one of the States of the Union a Territory which bears the name of the adjoining country by prefixing the adjective "New" shows the greatest vacuity of mind of which it is possible to conceive. It is no more New Mexico in point of age and settlement than any part of the Republic of Mexico, and I think we had better give the States that we admit American names. Why should we want to have a State in the Union whose inhabitants shall be spoken of as "Mexicans" and "New Mexicans?" I think there is a good deal of argument to be made on the question of the name of the Territory. But we are not to be allowed to change the name no matter how good the cause for a change may be.

I also have received letters from constituents of mine who are interested in certain bonds—I do not know the merits of the loan or what it is. They are known as Santa Fe bonds. I suppose they are the bonds of Santa Fe County. I will look and see just what they are. He says:

> Then the bill ought to be amended so that the indebtedness of the various counties, especially Santa Fe County, N. Mex., shall be taken care of. Otherwise the bondholders are likely to be placed in a bad fix. I am one of the bondholders of Santa Fe County, N. Mex.

That is from a constituent of mine who owns bonds issued by one of those counties. I do not know what protection there is for him in this bill. He is evidently satisfied as a bondholder that he is not protected. He wants more protection for the recovery of the money which he has lent in good faith. He wants to be assured, so far as law can assure him, of the payment of his just debt, principal and interest. But no amendment can be put in to protect him or any other man who has lent money for any purpose to counties in either of those Territories.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. The Senator would not ask to have the new State or the old Territory assume the county indebtedness of one county or increase the security of the bondholder; and certainly no act we could pass would decrease his security under the law.

Mr. LODGE. I would have the State made responsible for the county bonds, the issue of which it authorized.

Mr. MASON. That is when a State——

Mr. LODGE. Authorizes a county to issue bonds.

Mr. MASON. Authorizes a county to issue bonds for county purposes, and your constituent loaned money to the county, you would now ask the State to pay the county debt?

Mr. LODGE. I would. After the Territory had done it, I would make the State responsible and let the State deal with its county in its own way. That is exactly what Arizona has done as a matter of fact. She has assumed the county debt——

Mr. MASON. I judge from the debates here that when that was attempted to be done it was not entirely satisfactory.

Mr. LODGE. Arizona repudiated one set of bonds and accepted two other sets of bonds.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Can the Senator recall an instance in the history of the United States where a State has so assumed the payment of the bonds of a county or been held liable for them?

Mr. LODGE. I do not say after a State, as a State, does it. Of course, I do not mean to say that we can compel a State to pay county bonds; but I do say that we can compel a Territory, which belongs to the United States, to be middling honest when it comes into the Union.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator makes an assumption that is not warranted by any state of facts which has ever existed in any Territory in the Union.

Mr. LODGE. I do not say it ever existed in regard to any Territory in the Union. I say it ought not to exist, and we have a right to protect our constituents.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MASON. I do not care to interrupt the Senator if he objects.

Mr. LODGE. Not in the least.

Mr. MASON. I am sure he wants to be correct in the matter. I do not care to discuss with him the proposition that his constituents should have increased security by reason of statehood. I think your constituent loaned the money to the county, and he should look to it. I do not care to discuss that. But the omnibus bill—I suppose it has not been called to your attention—provides that the constitutional convention, when called, can name the State whatever the people of that State desire to name it. So your objection as to calling it New Mexico would hardly be a sound one, when the bill itself which we are to pass, if we can get a vote on it, provides that the people in their constitutional convention, which is the nearest convention to the people, are to be permitted to name their State.

Mr. LODGE. I think while the Territory is still ours—and it is ours while it still belongs to the United States and is under its Government—we have a right to make such terms as we please before we part with all power over it.

Mr. MASON. Do you not think it is a fair proposition to permit the people of the State to christen their own State in their constitutional convention?

Mr. LODGE. Judging from some of the results, I should say we could better trust the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I dislike very much to interrupt my colleague, but may I make one suggestion in this connection?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not the true principle that these county debts are wholly or largely contracted for State purposes and State instrumentalities, for court-houses and schools, and things which the State does? I respectfully submit to the honorable Senator from Illinois, and to other Senators who have interrupted my colleague, that where a State has permitted its counties to build court-houses or to establish schools or universities or do any of the things which are recognized as the functions of the State (a function which the State performs for convenience by dividing itself into counties to do it) it is not only reasonable but decent that the State should see that those debts are paid, for the State has had the benefit.

Mr. MASON. I will say to the Senator that it is not the law, nor can I conceive that the ethics are, that when I loan a county money, and when the Territory asks for a certain advantage, to become a State, I should stand in the doorway and say, "Now, unless you pay the debts of your county, you can not become a State."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. MASON. Let me finish my illustration. We passed a bill here some days ago, without the aid or consent of the Senator from Massachusetts or myself, which permitted one of our children, as you have described the county as being a part of the organization of the State, the Philippine Islands, to coin silver. We gave them the free and unlimited coinage of silver. We did not like the medicine for ourselves, but we permitted our child to partake of it, much to the discomfiture of our child and at the loss of some millions of dollars. They issued that coin with our consent, with our approval, with our permission. Are we to stand in the doorway and say, "We are to pay all those debts?" I think possibly in good morals and good ethics we should.

But the junior Senator from Massachusetts is here just this moment speaking for a bondholder who loans money to a county; and this bill provides for the safety of his security, and that the contract of the loan made by his constituent with that county shall not be impaired. Whether this bill passes or not, he will hold the same security for the debt that he does now.

My proposition is that when, on the great question of making a State, we leave the creditor in the same position that he was in, not lessening the value of his security, he ought not to stand in the way of the progress of the rest of the State by saying: "I have caught you in a tight place, and I want your bond. The county issued the bond as a part of the proposed State. You permitted it." For the bondholder was a party to the contract and was satisfied with the security. I say it is not only against precedent and against practice, but it is manifestly unfair to ask the other counties of the State to become guarantors upon the bonds issued by one county.

Mr. HOAR. If I may have my colleague's permission for one moment, to illustrate the point——

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I happen to have some familiarity with it from former employments as counsel, and I have a question now coming before the Supreme Court of the United States involving the principle with which we are dealing, which makes me presume to say something about it.

We had a law in Massachusetts by which the several towns raised money to provide their quota of soldiers for the war, and the question arose before our supreme court of the constitutionality of the law which allowed the towns to do that. Our supreme court said, "This is a matter that the State of Massachusetts is doing. She is furnishing her quota, but doing it by the towns is merely a convenience; it is a State instrumentality; it is the action of the State, and it is made uniform by the various towns contributing their share."

Now, that being true, the Territory of Arizona, or whichever is the one under discussion, adopts a method of performing, through the counties, Territorial obligations of the government, namely, the building of bridges, the establishment of schools, and other things of that kind, especially the building of court-houses, providing for the holding of court. That is the only way in which the county could constitutionally do such a thing; that is, the Territory, for convenience, divides up a Territorial function among the different counties. The Territory had the whole benefit of this bondholder's loan. The Territory would have had to do it if the county had not; and the Territory did it practically through the instrumentality of the counties.

Now, then, it is proposed by the Congress of the United States to wipe that Territory out of existence, with all its obligations, with all its capacity to raise money as a Territory, with all its capacity to pay debts or perform public obligations; and it seems to me that the contention is a very reasonable one, "Before you do that, you must see that your past public obligations are secured and performed." Now, whether that is true or not, that is what seems to me to be true and wise and sensible.

Mr. MASON. May I say one word? My proposition is, if the Senator please, that the bill now before the Senate provides that the contract already made for the security of debts shall not be impaired, and that there shall be no diminution of the Territory and the property originally given as a guaranty of those bonds.

Mr. HOAR. But the equitable obligation of that Territory to see that that thing is done by its county is impaired and its power to do so is destroyed. There is to be no more Territory.

Mr. MASON. Suppose there are two counties, and one desires certain improvements, and the State says, "We can not afford to build you a county court-house, but if you want to tax the people of your own county you may, if you can establish a credit in Boston where you can borrow the money, and there is a man who is willing to loan it to you, and take it upon your county and not put a mortgage upon the lands and the property of other counties," where is the injustice in leaving it just where it was when the party assumed the loan?

Mr. HOAR. We have just built a new court-house in the county where I live—the county of Worcester—and paid for it by a county debt. I undertake to say that if the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should be merged into some other State or be annexed to Rhode Island, our larger neighbor, or something of that kind, the Congress of the United States ought to see that Massachusetts, before she were abolished, provided that all the public obligations contracted by her counties for her benefit were secured.

Mr. MASON. That is just what this bill does. It provides that all the security——

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. MASON. It provides that all the security originally taken shall be unimpaired. The making of a new State is not a collection bureau.

Mr. HOAR. But the Senator leaves out of sight the point that one principal security for these county debts is the moral obligation of the Territory to see that they are paid. You propose to destroy that.

Mr. MASON. And the Senator can see no injustice——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. MASON. I beg pardon. The Senator can see no injustice in the county adjoining you that has not a court-house——

Mr. HOAR. Not the slightest.

Mr. MASON. Being taxed for your court-house——

Mr. HOAR. Not the slightest in the world.

Mr. MASON. While they have to go and build their own court-house at their own expense?

Mr. HOAR. I see not only no injustice, but the highest justice and moral obligation.

Mr. MASON. They shall build your court-house, and you shall not assist them to build theirs?

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. He is engaged in the discussion of this question from an ethical standpoint. As I understand, he thinks that these counties in New Mexico and elsewhere ought to be allowed to repudiate their debts through a technical defense which he has set up here.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator does not——

Mr. ALDRICH. The junior Senator from Massachusetts read a letter which shows, so far as it shows anything in connection with this discussion, that there are certain counties, including the county of Santa Fe, N. Mex., which are trying to repudiate their debts. That is a consideration which addresses itself to the Senate, and it is a very important point outside of the technical question which the Senator from Illinois raises, as to whether we should admit into the Union a people, a community, or a set of communities, or a combination of communities, with such repudiating tendencies.

Mr. MASON. I hope the Senator does not understand that I have any such idea of common honesty.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I did not understand that the Senator went quite to that extent, but the Senator said——

Mr. MASON. I say this: That upon the question of the admission of new States it should neither be made an opportunity of evading an honest debt nor should it be made a collection agency whereby gentlemen who have loaned money to a county seek to increase their security by spreading that debt out upon the people of the State, who have not had the benefit of the county improvement. That is my contention.

Mr. ALDRICH. But in communities entitled to admission into this great commonwealth of States there ought to be no collection agency necessary.

Mr. MASON. That is just what I say, and when the question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will read the bill we are asking the Senate to pass he will see that it provides every dollar of that indebtedness shall be paid, and that it shall be paid by the people who promised to pay it, and that the security which they originally took when they loaned their money shall neither be enlarged nor diminished. If that is not a fair security and a fair collection I do not know what is.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I desire to say merely one word concerning the assertion made by the Senator from Rhode Island. He says that the letter read by the Senator from Massachusetts indicates that there is a purpose to repudiate upon the part of the county of Santa Fe. I submit that there is not anything in the letter which the Senator from Massachusetts has read which indicates anything of that kind.

Mr. LODGE. I did not read the whole of the letter.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But the part which was read to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I read only the last part.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would be glad to read the letter for the information of the Senator.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I am speaking of what was read in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be obliged to the Senator from Rhode Island if he will read the whole letter.

Mr. ALDRICH (reading):

> Unless the bill is amended so that the indebtedness of various counties, especially of Santa Fe County, N. Mex., is taken care of, the bondholders are likely to be placed in a bad fix.

I can not understand how they can be placed in a bad fix unless there is some tendency on the part of these counties to repudiate their debts.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I do not look at it in that way.

Mr. ALDRICH. That would be my understanding of the language.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I wish to say just one other word, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] a moment or two ago said that in his county they built a court-house and that that court-house stood as against the people of Massachusetts. I have never in my life heard of any county in any State building a court-house in that manner. A county debt is a county debt, and not a State debt. Whether it be in a Territory or in a State it is a county debt, and a county debt only. If in the State of Massachusetts an attempt were made to make the debt of Worcester County the debt of Massachusetts, there would be a beautiful state of affairs.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only introduced that letter as an illustration. There is unfortunately in the minds of some persons a very unjust suspicion, no doubt, but there is a suspicion in the minds of some persons, especially those persons who have lent them money, that "the heroic builders of waste places" whom we have heard so much eulogized here do not always pay their debts, and their anxiety finds expression in such letters as this. It has found expression also in the actions of Mr. Coler. The result has been that the unfortunate persons who have lent money to the "heroic builders of waste places" are held up as a set of sharks because they want to have their debts paid.

Now, it seems to me that that is a reasonable desire. I do not see why the men who have lent money to "the builders of waste places" should not get paid just as much as the men who have lent money to somebody else; and if they have doubts as to the probability of their getting paid I think they have a right to express them, and I think we have a right to look into this bill, and before those borrowers pass out of the hands of the United States, to inquire if the citizens of the United States who have lent money there are properly protected. I have a great regard and admiration for the "builders of waste places," but I also have some regard for the people of Massachusetts, and if any of them have interests in the Territories and desire protection, to the best of my feeble power I shall try to give it to them.

I have been led off in this matter of the debt. I used it only as an illustration, but as it has been so much discussed I will add one word more.

Perhaps every right of my constituent, whose letter I have read, is protected in this bill. Perhaps it is not. If it is not, we can have no amendment. It makes no difference whether the protection is there or not, there is to be no amendment. No amendment is to be allowed on any part of the bill. There is such an overwhelming popular demand for this bill that its friends are afraid to let it go back with an amendment to the House of Representatives, where it originated. They do not dare to trust it in the hands of those who carelessly sent it to us without sufficient observation. They are not willing that the House of Representatives should have an opportunity or a chance to change its mind.

Mr. President, I think a bill which we are afraid to have go back to the House for fear it will die in the place where it was born, and therefore that we can not amend, is a bill, considering the importance of its object, which warrants the strongest and most determined resistance those opposed to it can give. The very fact that the bill is not to be changed or amended in any respect like other bills which come before the Senate, and that we must pass it just as it is or not at all, and that all amendments are to be voted down, is, to my mind, an absolute justification for resistance to this bill at every point and at every stage to the utmost extent of our power.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the nature of the bill as here presented, and now I wish to speak of the conditions which, it seems to me, ought to exist in order to warrant our admitting any Territory or any portion of a Territory belonging to the United States as a State of the Union. We of course do not propose to admit waste land, unoccupied and uninhabited territory, great vacant spaces of the earth, to the privileges of States and to representation here merely because they belong to us or because we have acquired them in a treaty in which we have said that we will some day admit them to statehood. No sensible man wishes to create States like that. They would be worse than the famous borough of Old Sarum, which was one of the best examples of the evils which led to the English reform bill in 1832, being a supposed town or village which had a member of Parliament, although no such village existed. We can not admit as a State a merely vacant space of the earth's surface. Population, therefore, must be the first condition of the admission of a State.

Now, as to what shall constitute a sufficient population to warrant the admission of a given area to statehood is worthy, as I think, of some examination. The framers of the Constitution said that there should be at least 30,000 before a new State could be admitted; that is, we having a population, roughly speaking, at the time of about 4,000,000 people, they thought it was not fair to admit a new State into the Union with less than 30,000 inhabitants. They held that to be a fair number in proportion and in relation to the people of all the United States. Thirty thousand is about 2½ per cent of the four million population, and 2½ per cent of 76,000,000 is something like a million and a half. I am speaking in round numbers.

That is the first guide we have to go by, the fact that the framers of the Constitution thought a State to be entitled to admission into the Union should have a population amounting to 2½ per cent of the total population of the United States.

We now come to the ordinance of 1787. They fixed the population at 60,000. Neither of these figures has been followed in the admission of States. The number accepted as sufficient for admission has been entirely arbitrary; and the rule or custom which has become familiar to men's minds, that to admit a new State it should have as much population as should be enough to constitute a Congressional district at that time, is just as arbitrary as any of the others. The question of population must be to a large extent a question of discretion. It would not be fair to a new Territory to demand that it should necessarily have a million and a half inhabitants. That might be much too large. On the other hand, we have the absolute right to demand that it should have a population sufficient to prevent its being too much out of relation to the other States and to prevent the difference between the representation here and that in the House from being too glaring. There is no rule or law as to how much population a new State ought to have. It certainly ought not to go below what is requisite for one Congressional district. A new State ought to have at least the population which is required of every Congressional district in the United States. It should have enough population to have one Representative on the floor of the House without regard to its being being admitted as a State. That does not seem an unreasonable demand.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not know that I clearly understand the Senator from Massachusetts. Does he intend now to establish a brand-new precedent?

Mr. LODGE. No; I am not establishing any precedent at all. There is no precedent.

Mr. DUBOIS. With the exception of Utah and South Dakota, I think there has been no State admitted for a number of years when their population entitled them to a representation in Congress.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to reply to that?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Idaho is utterly mistaken. Of the nineteen States west of the Mississippi River which have been admitted into the Union, all, with the exception of four States, either had more than or pretty near the ratio for a Representative at the time of their admission. I will read the figures, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, in this connection.

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure. I shall be very glad to have the Senator give the figures.

Mr. NELSON. I have a statement here which illustrates what I say. As we go back over the history of our country, we find the ratio of representation to have been as follows:

In 1790, it was 33,000; in 1800, the ratio was 33,000; in 1810, 35,000; in 1820, 40,000; in 1830, 47,700; in 1840, 70,680; in 1850, 93,423; in 1860, 127,381; in 1870, 131,425; in 1880, 151,911; in 1890, 173,901; and in 1900, the present ratio, or the ratio for the next House of Representatives, is 194,182.

Now I will compare the different States with this ratio. Louisiana was admitted in 1812. The ratio in 1810 was 35,000. At that time, according to the census of 1810, Louisiana had 76,556 people. Allowing for the two years' increase, it is evident that Louisiana had more than twice the ratio needed for a Representative in Congress.

Coming to the State of Missouri, it was admitted in 1821. The ratio for a Representative in 1820 was 40,000, and the population of Missouri in 1820 was 66,557, giving it population enough for one and a half Representatives.

Arkansas was admitted in 1836. The nearest census year we come to that is 1840. The ratio in 1840 was 70,680, and at that time Arkansas had a population of 97,574, showing that Arkansas had ample population for a Representative in Congress at the time she was admitted, according to the ratio that was then existing.

Texas was admitted in 1845. I have no statistics as to the population, but in 1850, five years afterwards, she had a population of 212,423.

Iowa was admitted in 1846. Mr. President, I have here a table showing the date of the admission of the several States west of the Mississippi River, the ratio of population for a Representative in Congress for each census period from 1790 down to and including 1900, and showing also the population of the several States. I am anxious to save the time of the Senate, and therefore I ask that this table may be printed as part of my remarks and as a reply to the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The table referred to is as follows:

Population of the United States at each census from 1790 to 1900.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I understood him, took the position that no State should be admitted unless it had sufficient population to give it representation in the House of Representatives. I may have been too sweeping in the statement that comparatively few States at the time of their admission had sufficient population to entitle them to such representation; but I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota and of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that among the recently admitted States west of the Rocky Mountains Wyoming had 60,000 population when it was admitted, Idaho had 80,000, and Montana considerably less than enough to entitle it to representation in the House of Representatives. Half of the States which have been admitted for the last twenty-five years have not had at the time of their admission nearly sufficient population to entitle them to representation in the other House of Congress. Therefore I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he is now establishing a new precedent? Population has not by any means been the only consideration in the past.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not say so. I said that a Territory seeking admission as a State ought to have such a population. The old rule laid down, as pointed out in the report of the committee, and the rule that we were supposed to live up to, was that a Territory to be admitted should have the population of a Congressional district. That was observed in some cases, but in many other cases it has not been observed as the population necessary to constitute a Congressional district has increased. I think that though the line as drawn was perfectly arbitrary, still there was some reason in it. I think that a State ought to have a population equal to that of a Congressional district before it has in the Senate the representation of two Senators and in the House the representation of one Member. I think that is very little to ask.

But I was trying to argue that the question of population was one in regard to which discretion was necessary. We have no definite precedent; we have no definite law about it. We have to exercise a certain reasonable discretion. We do not wish to ask too much, but we ought to ask enough so that the disparity between the State's representation here and its great power in this Chamber and that which it possesses in the other Chamber shall not be too glaring.

Mr. President, I have occupied the floor for more than two hours and a half; I am tired, and I shall be obliged to leave the Chamber in a very short time. So I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate that I may complete to-morrow what I have to say.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts should be required to go on to-night. I think it is desirable that we should have a short executive session before adjournment; but before making that motion, I desire to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate.

But four or five weeks of the present session remain; there is much public business that should be done; and I will ask unanimous consent that, commencing to-morrow, the unfinished business, the statehood bill, shall be taken up at 2 o'clock and be kept before the Senate, subject to appropriation bills and conference reports, until the usual hour of adjournment, in the neighborhood of 6 o'clock. Then we should have the morning hour to be devoted to business on the Calendar and to doing executive business.

I make that request because I believe it will facilitate the business of the Senate, and that we shall not profit anything by going on in the way we have been going on in the last twenty-four or forty-eight hours.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, as at present advised I can not consent to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island. If the Senator from Rhode Island will include in his request for unanimous consent an arrangement for fixing an hour for taking the final vote on the statehood bill, I will assent to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not in charge of the statehood bill or of the opposition to the statehood bill, and therefore I can not make any such arrangement.

Mr. QUAY. Then I object to the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I suggest that there is not a quorum present in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Clark, Wyo.	Harris,	Morgan,

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PRITCHARD] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. MONEY] is unavoidably absent on account of sickness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-nine Senators have responded to their names.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I have no desire to send for absent Senators this evening, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 29, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 28, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, on the final vote in the House yesterday on Senate bill 3287, to increase the salaries of the judges of the United States courts, I find that I am not recorded as paired. I was paired with the Representative from California [Mr. LOUD], who so understood, and did not himself vote.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the announcement of the following appointments:

To be members of the Memorial Association of the District of Columbia (27 Stat. L., p. 396), John W. Douglas and Charles J. Bell.

To be members of the Temporary Committee on Accounts (28 Stat. L., p. 768), Mr. HILDEBRANT of Ohio, Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia, and Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.

DANIEL P. MARSHALL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, with an amendment of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 15069) to increase the pension of Daniel P. Marshall.

The amendment was read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF LIVE STOCK, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, with amendments of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 15922) making appropriations for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes.

The amendments were read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House, in pursuance of the order made two days ago, Senate amendments to the House bill (13679) for the amendment of the bankruptcy law. These amendments have been once read to the House, and if there is no demand now, the reading will be omitted. The Chair hears no such request.

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments. I desire to call the attention of my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to this motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. JENKINS. How much time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. About ten minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the motion to concur in the amendments of the Senate to this bill amending the bankruptcy act, because if we concur at this time, that action passes the bill; and I do not believe that we shall get any other remedial legislation for many years to come. I think that the House ought to make an effort to have its bill passed as it left the House, or at least that we ought to insist on some of the House provisions which I believe to be very vital and very necessary. There is only one way in which that can be done, and that is for this House to nonconcur and send the bill to conference. Of course this does not necessarily mean that the bill will entirely fail if we send it to conference, because if our conferees should be unable to get the Senators to agree with the position the House has taken in this matter, we shall yet have the opportunity to concur.

Now, I understand from the gentleman in charge of the bill that the Senate refuses to consider anything that comes from this side of the House on this subject—insists that we ought to concur now, or the bill will fail. Well, I have not heard that statement made very often in reference to bills coming back here from the Senate; but I think we ought to send the bill to a conference and let the Senate conferees send their message directly and officially back to this House before we tamely submit and accept the terms that they dictate in the matter.

There is one provision of the House bill which has been stricken out by the Senate in which I feel a very vital interest. It is a matter that affects my own State particularly and may affect some other States in the Union, although there are some that will not be affected. In the State of Alabama we have an exemption of $1,000 on personal property. That exemption is very large. With that we have included an exemption of $2,000 worth of real estate; so there is $3,000 exempt to every man in the State of Alabama. If you were to distribute that exemption equally among all the citizens of the State of Alabama, there is not enough property in the State to equal the aggregate amount of the exemption: in other words, a sheriff could never levy an execution in the State of Alabama if such a distribution were made. Now, the constitution and laws of the State of Alabama provide that this exemption may be waived, so that the debtor may obtain credit if he has not over $3,000 worth of property. I was on the Judiciary Committee when the original bankruptcy law was prepared, and I know it was not the intention of that committee at that time to interfere with the local exemption law of the State. It was no intention of ours to have the bankruptcy court interfere with the right of a debtor to waive his exemption.

Under the decisions of the court, Mr. Speaker, they have held that notwithstanding the State law allows a man to waive his exemptions, yet if he voluntarily takes advantage of the bankruptcy act and goes into the bankrupt court he may claim his exemptions against these waived notes or against this waiver on exemptions. In other words, he may have a thousand dollars' worth of personal property and write a note in which he says, "I will waive my personal exemptions if you will give me credit in the State of Alabama," and after he has waived that exemption, treated with me to that effect, and borrowed my money on that waiver, he can turn around under the decisions of the United States courts, go into the bankrupt court, and claim his exemption and defraud me of my money, which I have given him on the face of the credit of his having waived that exemption. Now, I say that when this bill was before the House we put in it a provision preventing the courts of the United States from interfering with the State laws on the exemption question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not true that the Supreme Court of the United States has not yet decided the question to which the gentleman refers, and that the various circuit courts and the circuit court of appeals are divided upon the question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, it has not reached the Supreme Court. I understand that in the district courts there has been some division. I have not heard of any division in the court of appeals.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The court of appeals for our circuit, the fifth, has decided what I state.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has decided it by a divided court.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A majority of the court has decided what I have stated.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And as long as that decision stands, notwithstanding it is a divided court, it is the law. Now, I say that if we put in the law to-day this amendment that the State law shall not be interfered with, it prevents a debtor from defrauding his creditors by pretending to waive his exemptions and then going into the bankrupt court and claiming that which is waived, which can not hurt anybody. If he does not want to waive his exemptions, he need not. In some States he can not waive his exemptions. It does not interfere in those States where he can not waive exemptions, but it merely allows the State law to be carried out. Now, if you allow this provision to stay on the statute books as it is, allowing a man to waive his exemptions and then go into court and defraud his creditors, the result will be that this law will be made intensely unpopular, as it is growing to-day in the State of Alabama, and it will tend that way in other States.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Suppose this Senate provision shall stand, would any person give to any other person credit upon a waiver of the exemption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that it is not the Senate provision we want to stand. We want the House provisions, which the Senate has stricken out, to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I mean that if this law shall pass in such shape that a man can not make a general waiver——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman means if we do not grant any relief in the matter, will they give credit?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will state that they do. I do not know why, but they do. There is credit given and it is a common occurrence in my State for a man to sign a waived note and then afterwards turn around and claim his exemptions in the courts and be discredited.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if, while insisting that the right of waiver of homesteads and exemptions should be upheld by the bankrupt court, he also insists that that waiver should be in favor of the particular individual to whom it may be given, and, if so, would that not be a preference and be an act of bankruptcy under the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, all I insist on is this, that the State law in reference to exemptions in the various States shall not be interfered with by the bankrupt law. That is the effect of the provision we put in the House bill. If the law in the gentleman's State is one way and in my State the other, it interferes with neither State. It merely provides that the United States courts, through the bankruptcy act, shall not overturn the provisions of law made by the States in reference to exemptions.

Mr. McRAE. But if the exemption is a personal privilege, as all courts hold, and that is the reason which underlies it, then the contention of the gentleman is that it should inure to the man in favor of whom the waiver is made, and not to the general assets of the assignor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, certainly.

Mr. McRAE. Then is not the waiver of it a preference and, therefore, an act of bankruptcy under this law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer my friend if he will give me his attention. Until a man has waived his exemptions the exemption does not belong to the creditor. If my friend from Arkansas has $2,000 worth of property, and gives me a note for $1,000, as to $1,000 worth of that property that note is of no value because it can not be levied on. It is not liable to his debt; it is no security, and I understood that at the time.

On the other hand, if he gives me a note, waiving that exemption, then I have a thousand dollars for my security. Now, if he is willing to waive that and give that security to one man, why, of course, it is a preference which he has given me, something that he has not given to the other creditor at all. It is just exactly the same as if he owned a farm and he gives a mortgage to one creditor and refuses to give it to another creditor. Under the bankruptcy act the man who has got the mortgage still maintains his lien, but it does not apply when it comes to personalty in the way of exemption.

Mr. McRAE. Then take the illustration you make. Your contention is then——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McRAE. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield a few moments, in order that I may get an answer to my question.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield sufficient time to let the gentleman from Alabama answer the question of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. McRAE. Take the illustration you make: If I have $2,000 worth of property with one thousand exempt and give you my note for $1,000 and waive my exemptions and go in debt after I give you my note to the extent of, say, $5,000, and when you put me in bankruptcy I have nothing but the $1,000 which is exempt. Now, do you insist that it would be right for you to take the whole of my estate and let my other creditors get nothing, or do you want to divide this thousand dollars between all creditors? What will be the effect of it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend from Arkansas can readily see that the other creditors to whom the exemption was not waived have nothing anyhow, because when the debtor claims his exemptions in the bankruptcy court he gets his thousand dollars and gets his discharge, and they have nothing to do with the thousand dollars that is exempt, because it was never waived to them.

Mr. McRAE. Then is it a preference——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, it is not a preference.

Mr. McRAE. In favor of the man to whom you waived it, and is not that itself an act of bankruptcy?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I see what my friend means, but I say not at all. The creditors to whom the exemption has not been waived have nothing to do with the thousand dollars, because it is exempt anyway.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It could not be made an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It could not be made an act of bankruptcy. But as to the man to whom the exemption was waived, until this bankruptcy law was passed he had a right to that property. It was an asset that belonged to him. It was an asset on which he gave credit, and this bankruptcy law, as construed by the courts, is taking that property away from the creditor, taking the creditor's rights away from him to levy on the property that under the State law belonged to me, and I say that it is an injustice, and I say the House ought to insist on that provision of the bill. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JENKINS. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CLAYTON. Ten minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the motion made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. JENKINS]. I regret to have to differ from my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] who has just addressed the House.

I support the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] because, in my judgment, the amendments offered by the Senate to the bill as it originally passed the House improve the measure. They improve it in that they cut down the fees of court officials, referees, and others. They improve it further by adding a new section, 72, which provides:

> That neither the referee nor the trustee shall in any form or guise receive, nor shall the court allow them, any other or further compensation for their services than that expressly authorized and prescribed in this act.

And another reason that constrains me to support the motion to concur in the Senate amendment is the very fact that the Senate has stricken out this harsh provision of the House bill which was offered at the instance of my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and about which he has just spoken.

It is one thing, gentlemen, for a debtor to voluntarily give his creditor a promissory note waiving his exemptions. Perhaps there were personal considerations and private reasons that may have induced him to do that. He did that with no idea of a bankruptcy proceeding. When he is involuntarily thrown into the bankruptcy court, a thing not contemplated when he gave that note, I think it is entirely right and proper under the changed conditions that he be allowed to claim his exemptions. It is entirely right and proper to let him do so, as the courts now permit.

I want to call the attention of the House to the amendment which has just been discussed by my colleague and which the Senate has stricken out:

> That when the bankrupt in any State has waived his right to claim his exempt property to his creditors, the bankruptcy court shall not set apart to him this exemption as against said creditors.

That seems to confiscate exempt property to the use of all the creditors. The debtor did not waive his exemption in favor of his general creditors. To them he did not give the waiver. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] well asks the question if you do not make this waiver, this confiscating process, as it may be termed, apply in favor of all the creditors, instead of limiting it to the one holding the instrument of waiver, it would give that one a preference under the bankruptcy law. I do not know how the courts would construe this provision.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to detain the House any longer. When this bill was originally before the House I was opposed to it. I am now opposed to a bankruptcy law any longer remaining on our statute books.

Mr. GILBERT. Do not you think that the bankruptcy law ought to allow it with the consent of the wife? Now, in Kentucky——

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman will pardon me; I have only ten minutes; and that is a question I do not care to go into. It does not touch the phase of the question I am now discussing. I have no doubt the gentleman from Wisconsin will give you time to make that understood. I would like to do so if I had time to discuss it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I was proceeding to say, I have always been opposed to this bankruptcy legislation, and tried to have this law repealed. The sentiment of the country will yet be aroused in such a way that Congress will repeal this law.

This law, in my humble judgment, is being made more and more a collection agency. It is upheld and advocated in the main by the city jobbers and wholesale merchants for their benefit. The amendment about which my colleague has talked is more and more in the interest of the creditor. The unfortunate is treated with but little consideration. The law is too severe, and this amendment adds to its severity. There is too little of thought in the bankruptcy law of the unfortunate debtor. The matter of collecting debts and the enforcement of private contracts could be better left to the States and to the laws of the States than to the Federal courts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to say any more. I wish I had an opportunity to vote for the repeal of this law, but inasmuch as I am denied that opportunity and inasmuch as in my judgment these Senate amendments improve the House bill, I shall support the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JENKINS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I voted against this bill when it passed the House and was sent to the Senate. I voted for the proposition made by the minority of the Judiciary Committee of the House to repeal the bankruptcy law now upon the statute books. I have not changed my opinion in the least particle with reference to the propriety and correctness of that vote.

I have rather been strengthened in the conviction that that vote was correct, and that the vast majority of the people of this country are now demanding that this bankruptcy law, which was heretofore enacted, should be repealed. Every banker in my town has written me letters or spoken to me on the subject, asking me to aid in its repeal. I have but to read an extract from a letter which I hold in my hand here from one of the most prominent bankers of that city, the president of the oldest national bank in the city, in which he said:

> What a godsend it would be to the whole country if the bankruptcy law could be repealed.

To show the sentiment of the business men of my city, the bankers of the State of Georgia, in convention assembled at Savannah last year, almost unanimously passed resolutions requesting Congress to repeal this law. I am still of the opinion that it should be repealed.

My immediate constituents favor the repeal of the bankrupt law, and have indorsed my vote at the last session of this Congress to repeal it.

The Democratic convention of the sixth Congressional district of Georgia, which I have the honor to represent on this floor, on July 8, 1902, in nominating a candidate for Congress from that district for the Fifty-eighth Congress, declared as follows:

> We do not believe in a permanent system of bankruptcy; and, believing that the bankruptcy law has answered its purpose, we favor its repeal and indorse our immediate Representative for his effort to have the same repealed.

I am of opinion that the sound public judgment of the people will continue to demand its repeal until in the very near future Congress will answer that demand by wiping this law from the statute book. A bankrupt law should not exist at all except for a very short period.

Now, I shall support the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the House concur in the amendments made by the Senate to this bill, because I believe they greatly improve the House bill; that they greatly add to it, and that they take from some of the provisions in the bill of the House some of its most rigorous and harshest provisions. In addition to that I call attention to the amendment that the Senate has made on page 7, the twenty-eighth amendment. The House bill provided:

> That the wife shall not be so examined except as to business transactions to which she is or has been a party, and she may be examined to determine that fact.

That is, to business transactions she may have had with her husband. The Senate struck that out and have inserted—

> That the wife may be examined only touching business transacted by her or to which she is a party, and to determine the fact whether she has transacted or been a party to any business of the bankrupt.

Therefore the Senate has seen fit to emasculate, to tone down this harsh provision which the House bill contained, and to which I called the attention of the House when the bill was before the House, and it now only permits the wife to be examined as to her own business.

Now, with reference to the provision which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says ought to remain in the bill, I desire to say that, in my judgment, the Senate has wisely stricken that provision from the bill.

The proposition is that a man who makes a general waiver in an ordinary note, not in favor of a particular person, not in favor of a particular debt, not in favor of a lien given upon a particular piece of property, but a general blanket waiver, that he shall be deprived of his exemption, simply because he has made that waiver. Now, I say that the courts have uniformly held, unless authorized by constitutional provision, that a general waiver is not a lien. The question came up under the old bankrupt law.

Judge Deadeye, in the first case, decided that a general waiver was not good. That was subsequently upheld by most of the circuit courts of appeal. They have decided that a waiver of a homestead in a mortgage or lien in favor of a particular person, in favor of a particular piece of property, upon which a lien or mortgage is given, that that waiver is a particular lien. But in the law, as the Senate proposes to make it, we shall have this remarkable situation where a debt is destroyed by the bankrupt and the waiver lives. There is no lien, no mortgage, no right of the creditor to proceed and collect his debt, but simply the debt destroyed, the bankrupt discharged, and the waiver lives. It is an anomaly, and the courts have so recognized it.

As I stated to the gentleman from Alabama, the case went up from my own town and county to the circuit court of appeals, and the last decision was made, and there is a certificate of division of opinion, and will go to the Supreme Court of the United States. That question, Mr. Speaker, is whether or not a general waiver is good in favor of a general creditor, and is now, as I understand it, either on its way to the Supreme Court of the United States or pending there, where it will soon be decided.

How the Supreme Court may decide we do not know, but it is then time for us to amend the bankrupt law. If they do not decide that the waiver is good, then if it is the will of Congress we can provide for an amendment as well then as now, and provide in the bill as it was when it went from the House. In case they decide that it is bad, there is no need of an amendment. In other words, let us not tinker with the law too much, but wait until we can repeal it.

Mr. JENKINS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely trust that the motion of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will be adopted by this House. In June last, after a full day's debate, and a very able debate, to my mind, this House, by a vote of at least 2 to 1, decided that the bankruptcy law ought not to be repealed, and in deciding that question they settled it for this term of Congress. Now this bill comes back from the Senate with certain amendments, and so far as I have observed there is not an amendment that is not favorable to the debtor. When the question was under consideration before, every gentleman upon the other side of the House admitted that the bill ought to be amended. But they said that the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee were amendments that were too hostile to the debtor. Now, my friend from Georgia says that he is satisfied with the bill as it comes from the Senate, and I trust these amendments will be concurred in and that this amended bill will go upon the statute books.

A great commercial country like the United States, with 45 States, demands a uniform system of bankruptcy law. Suppose we leave it to the 45 States, what do we have? We have, as Mr. Webster said many years ago, forty-five "jarring systems" for the administration of bankruptcy. I tell you the time is past when we shall go back to the State system of the administration of bankrupt estates. The bankruptcy law is here to remain, and it is to remain with such amendments as Congress from time to time may make in justice to the creditor and in justice to the debtor.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to any permanent bankrupt law. I do not believe, sir, that it is morally right for the Government of the United States to enable the debtors of the country to pay their debts through a system of bankruptcy. Now, I opposed this bill when it was before the House on a former occasion and was passed. I stood then for the repeal of the present bankruptcy law, and I stand yet for the repeal of that law.

I believe, sir, that the day is speedily coming in this country when the sentiment of the people will so grow and strengthen that the members of Congress will not dare to turn a deaf ear to their demands that the bankruptcy statute be repealed. Taking that view of this subject, I am opposed to the motion made by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I will not compromise my position upon the bankruptcy legislation by voting for any kind of amendment.

Now, if we send this bill to a conference committee, as proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], those members who desire to do so will yet have the opportunity to vote for the Senate amendments, or some amendment, at least, that will modify the harsh terms of the present bankruptcy law. You lose nothing by sending it to conference.

If it be so referred, and they report back an amendment which may even greatly modify the present bankruptcy law, I shall still vote against the measure, because I believe that bankruptcy legislation is morally wrong. I am not willing to compromise by taking any part or parcel of it. In other words, I am not willing to vote for a vicious measure because, perchance, it may not be quite so bad as some other bill. I shall vote for measures that I believe to be right, and against measures that I believe to be wrong. Believing that any kind of permanent bankruptcy law is wrong, I shall vote against this bill, or any other bill that seeks to amend the existing bankruptcy law. This is all that I care to say.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I presume that I need not say in this presence that I am opposed to any kind of a bankruptcy act. If I had any inclination to support any such law in any form, I frankly confess that I should be disposed to support the Senate amendments to this bill, because they are more in favor of the debtor than the original bill. But I have no desire to popularize the bankruptcy act, and shall therefore vote against any proposition which seeks to perpetuate the present bankruptcy law. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the bankruptcy act now upon the national statute books is doing more to undermine personal credit and commercial honor than all other influences combined. I have in mind one merchant who, since the passage of this law, has gone into bankruptcy twice, and neither time paid 25 per cent dividend. And he may go on indefinitely, for there is no limit to the number of times that discharges can be granted under this act.

If you want proof of what the law is doing, read the list of failures under it.

There is but one way to get rid of an honest debt, and that is to pay it. And when you teach the merchants or business men of the country that when they contract debts they must pay them or forever bear the burden that their contracts involve, then you will inspire a spirit of commercial integrity that will give confidence, that will secure credit to honest men, that will make the American tradesman cautious, respectable, and honorable, and will drive from business those men who are not honest.

I see in the amendatory provisions—not so much in the Senate amendments as in the House bill—a disposition and inclination to enlarge the scope of the existing law. I see in the amendment discussed by the gentleman from Alabama a disposition to take from the wife and the children the homestead and personal exemptions that shelter them in time of financial distress, because of some inadvertent waiver on the part of the husband and the father. I see another amendment to the original law which seeks to expose to the public gaze the sacred relation between husband and wife by requiring the wife to be carried before the referee or the judge in bankruptcy to testify about transactions of the husband that should be secret so far as she is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, these matters of contract should be left to the individual, and the administration and enforcement of contracts to the States. The law should be repealed.

If there was any necessity for a bankruptcy law when this original act was passed, it has long since ceased. But we are told to-day by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] that this law has come so stay. In this way those who favor it will build upon it until they shall have a perfect engine of oppression that will be practically death to small traders and those who engage in business upon their integrity and with limited capital. Why, sir, under the law as it stands to-day there are but few of the small merchants of this country who can exist for a year if this law as amended by this bill is enforced against them.

UNION STATION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (S. 1425) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia. I ask that this report with the statement be printed under the rule.

The report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 43, 44, 46, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 4, 42, 45, and 47.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Between the words "railroads" and "properties," in said amendment, insert a comma; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 3 of the act, line 22, strike out "United States Reform School" and insert "Reform School of the District of Columbia;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 7 of the act, line 3, strike out "company" and insert "companies;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In said amendment strike out "Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington" and insert "Baltimore and Potomac;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 12 of the act, line 5, strike out beginning with "in the city of Washington" down to and including all of line 11, and in lieu thereof insert:

"Also, in the city of Washington the following-named streets are hereby vacated, abandoned, and closed, to wit, Ivy street, between South Capitol street and a point 230 feet east thereof: Second street NE., between N street and Delaware avenue, and, between the north side of M street and the south side of L street, so much of the bed of Delaware avenue as lies west of a line drawn parallel with the east building line of said avenue and 40 feet westerly therefrom."

And the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the section strike out the period, and at the beginning of the new matter strike out "except" and insert ": Provided, That;" and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to so much of the amendment of the House numbered 57 as involves striking out section 12 of the bill and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted to stand as section 12 insert the following:

"SEC. 12. That the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company shall establish and maintain a substation with suitable accommodation for passenger travel at a convenient location north of the Long Bridge and at a point to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

And the House agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 39 and 41, and on so much of amendment numbered 57 as relates to the striking out of section 13 of the bill and the substitution of matter in lieu thereof, the committee on conference have been unable to agree.

J. W. BABCOCK,
SYDNEY E. MUDD,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
W. P. DILLINGHAM,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The House recedes from its amendments Nos. 4, 42, and 47.

Nos. 4, 19, and 42 were clerical errors made by changing the name of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad to the Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington where the road under its old name was referred to.

No. 47 was intended to clarify the language used in the bill in regard to the taking of property. The original expression is deemed best.

Amendment No. 1 corrects a clerical error by inserting a comma.

Amendment No. 7 changes the phraseology used in the bill from the "United States Reform School" to the proper term, "Reform School of the District of Columbia."

Amendment No. 14 corrects a clerical error by changing the word "company" to "companies."

Amendment No. 23 does not enlarge the scope of the bill in any particular, but merely corrects the phraseology so as to put beyond dispute the streets to be vacated, abandoned, and closed.

Amendment No. 27 is a correction of phraseology.

That portion of amendment No. 57 which relates to the location of a station near the Long Bridge places it in the power of the Commissioners to locate such station at the point that shall be determined upon by them as the most convenient for the passenger travel which will use it.

The amendments on which the conference committee were unable to agree relate to that share of the cost of the elevation of grade crossings which is to be borne respectively by the railroads, and the Government, and the District of Columbia.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. JENKINS] a question in reference to one of the amendments of the Senate. I refer to Senate amendment No. 22, which proposes to strike out the word "frauds." It would seem that this amendment might result in permitting a discharge in bankruptcy where the indebtedness was incurred by fraud. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether, in his opinion, the provision would have that result?

I call his attention to the fact that in paragraph 4, or in the fourth exception under this section, it provides that discharges shall not be granted where the liabilities were created by the fraud of the bankrupt, but whether that will apply generally may be a question. I think the courts have held generally that the discharge will not be granted where the liability was created by fraud, but the Senate proposition is to strike out the word "frauds" where it occurs in line 12 of the printed bill, and I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] whether he can give us any enlightenment on this question? I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS] if he knows anything about it?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. If the gentleman puts the question to me, I have no question but that is not part of the discharge if the debt is fraudulently contracted.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. I say I have no question but if a debt is fraudulently contracted, the discharge will not relieve the debtor.

Mr. MANN. Under what provision of the bill?

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. That is under the provision of the bill which is found on the fifth page, section 17, as follows:

A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the State, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are liabilities for frauds, or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations.

Now, the Senate struck out the word "frauds," and the word "or" and allowed the balance of the sentence to stand. I understand by that that any debt which is contracted by false pretense or false representation is not discharged by operation of the discharge under the law.

Mr. MANN. Well, there are many other frauds, of course, besides false pretenses and false representations.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Speaker, may I not suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the word "fraud," omitted in subsection 2, is covered by "were created by fraud" in subsection 4, so as to prevent, probably, tautology.

Mr. MANN. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that subsection 4, using the word "fraud," would take the place of the word "fraud" as stricken out in subsection 2?

Mr. BELLAMY. I think so. I was just considering. I never considered it before, but in my opinion it would.

Mr. MANN. May I ask whether the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], cares to express any opinion on this question.

Mr. JENKINS. Why, Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Illinois it would make no difference what my opinion is. It is a question of construction and must be ultimately left to the courts. It is a mere matter of opinion and it must be left for the courts to decide, and any opinion I entertain would not be conclusive or binding upon anybody.

Mr. MANN. Well, it might be very instructive, if the gentleman had an opinion.

Mr. JENKINS. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Wisconsin has an opinion, but, as I have said, it will do no good to express it.

Mr. MANN. I am very glad to know that the gentleman has an opinion. Of course I would not ask the gentleman to enlighten the gentleman from Illinois on a question of law. I might have some doubt of his capacity.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ.]

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, I should very much prefer voting to abrogate and wipe off the statute books the entire bankruptcy act, but since that opportunity is not offered us, and the opportunity is offered to amend that law and make it very much better in a good many important particulars, I take it, sir, that it is the part of wisdom to accept those amendments and vote to improve the law so long as we can not repeal it. I am opposed to any bankruptcy law extending over any long period of time. I think the true principle underlying bankruptcy legislation is that which is laid down in the book of Deuteronomy. In the Jewish economy, every seven years, I believe, every man's debt was forgiven. In that "year of release" he was taken out from under the burden of judgments and debts and given a free start again in the race of life. And I think it is wise now, within every seven or ten years, to adopt a bankruptcy law for a limited period of time, in order that men laboring under impossible burdens of debt may be relieved.

This bankruptcy law, however, it seems to me, as has been well said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], has been conceived, construed, and administered in the interest of the collection agencies, and the creditor rather than the debtor class; and I am in favor of this motion for concurrence because the Senate amendments make the law fairer to the debtor class than the original House bill, or than the bankruptcy act as it now stands on the statute books. I can not understand exactly the contention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in insisting on the House amendment which has been stricken out by the Senate and which is in these words:

Provided, That when the bankrupt in any State has waived his right to claim his exempt property, to his creditors, the bankruptcy court shall not set apart to him this exemption as against said creditors.

Now, if that remains in the bill, and the gentleman's contention that it does not interfere with or repeal State exemption laws and decisions is correct, then we will have a different system of bankruptcy in almost every State in the Union. But subsection 4 of section 5 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States only gives the Congress the right "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." So that if this law does not conflict at all with the State laws on the subject of exemptions and insolvency, and a man could claim his exemptions in one State and could not claim them in another, as contended by the gentleman from Alabama, why, then that portion of the law at least would be unconstitutional, would be in contravention of this section of the Constitution, under which we derive our sole authority, and would not give us a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the Union.

Then, if that is not so, if his contention is correct, and this act does not operate uniformly, we would have a different system of bankruptcy in every State in the Union. A man could claim his exemptions in one State and not in another, and we would have a different system in the State courts and in the Federal courts. We would have a man claiming successfully his exemptions in the State courts, and, when thrown into bankruptcy, unable to claim them in the Federal courts.

So I think that the Senate did wisely in striking out that amendment, and I should be opposed to this bill going back to conference, for fear that that amendment somehow or other might get into it there. I think the bill is an improvement also, as pointed out by the gentleman from Georgia, as to the examination of married women and limiting that examination only to such transactions as were made by them and to which they were a party. The original House bill and the Senate amendments are a great improvement also upon the present bankruptcy act, it seems to me, in meeting the decision in the Carson-Piere-Scott case, in 182 United States, and relieving banks and business men from the trouble entailed by that decision, where payments were made in good faith within four months of the bankruptcy.

And then it is an improvement also upon the original bill, and the Senate amendments are an improvement upon the House bill, in reducing and fixing absolutely the fees which officers of these bankruptcy courts may charge.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman's statement is not exactly correct, if I may interrupt him. The House bill increased the fees over the original law.

Mr. KLUTTZ. And the Senate amendment cut them down.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I hope the motion of the chairman of the committee may prevail, and that the bill as amended may become a law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would not take up any further time of the House in discussing this proposition if I was not satisfied from the discussion that some of the gentlemen on this side of the House misapprehend what the amendment was that on my motion was added to the bill when it was before the House previously and that the Senate has now stricken out.

There is nothing in the proposition that interferes with the bankruptcy laws of any State. The real proposition is to prevent the courts of the United States from interfering with the State laws. It is merely a proposition to insist on local self-government.

Now, almost every State in the Union has its exemption laws. Is it any affair of the people of Georgia what exemption law the people of Alabama may have, or is it any affair of the people of Alabama what exemption laws the people of Mississippi may have? If it is not, then why should it be any affair of the Congress of the United States to go in and interfere with the exemption laws of one State or the other State, to say to the people of Alabama, "You have made a law under which your people can waive their exemptions, but we think we know more about your business in Alabama than you know, and therefore in the national halls of Congress we are going to pass a law that your people shall not waive their exemptions."

Now, that is all there is in this proposition. It is not a proposition to allow a man in Texas to waive his exemptions when he has not waived them, but it is a proposition to say that if the State of Alabama sees fit to let its own people waive their exemptions and get credit by that waiver the Federal Government will not interfere; and I say the Federal Government did not intend to interfere, because when we wrote the original bill there was an express provision written in it that this law should not interfere with the State exemption laws, and that is in the bill as it is now. But notwithstanding that fact the courts of the United States have said that where a man has waived his exemption in a State under whose laws he has a right to waive it, when he goes into the bankruptcy court voluntarily he may not claim that exemption and take away from the creditor that security he voluntarily gave to the creditor.

Mr. GILBERT. But that is in conformity to the State law, and that really applies only in those States where by the State law he is not permitted to waive his exemption.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; it does not. If that was the case I would have nothing to say, but that rule applies in Alabama, and it expressly is so held in Alabama by the United States courts, and that is what we are complaining of. Our people under our law are allowed to waive their exemption, and yet the Federal court says when they go into the bankruptcy court they can repudiate that waiver and defraud their creditor secured by the giving of that waiver. Now, it does not interfere with a State where no waiver is allowed. The only proposition is this: That the people of Alabama may be allowed to make their own exemption laws and the people of Kentucky make theirs, and that the Federal courts shall not interfere with either. That is all this provision asks for. It is a Democratic proposition, in line with the doctrines and principles of the party. It is local self-government. We think it just to our people to allow them to waive their exemption, and the people of Kentucky can do so or not as they want.

Mr. GILBERT. What do you say to the proposition that it destroys the uniformity of the application of the law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The uniformity was destroyed when it was provided in the original act that nothing in this bankruptcy act shall interfere with the exemption laws of the several States. The decision of the court has injected this.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. For lack of uniformity?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but that was the intention of Congress. Now, the Federal court has injected in here something that never was intended.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question on the motion.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 22.

So the motion to concur was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have addressed the House this morning be allowed five days to extend their remarks in the RECORD. I do this at the request of several gentlemen on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have addressed the House this morning on the bankruptcy bill be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD. For how long?

Mr. JENKINS. For five days.

The SPEAKER. For five days. Without objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, being the bill H. R. 15804.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. GROSVENOR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15804. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For subsistence and civilization of the Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, Wichitas, and affiliated bands who have been collected in the reservations set apart for their use and occupation, $35,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move, in line 8, to strike out the word "thirty-five" and insert "twenty-five." Pending that motion, I would call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to the fact that in the prior bill this was $25,000. I should like to inquire the reason for the increase of $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amount was reduced last year and the appropriation was changed, limiting the expenditure for the Wichitas alone, my friend will discover if he has read the bill closely, as I know he has. That amount was found to be insufficient. It required a large part of the appropriation to pay the agency expenses alone, and there was not, outside of that expenditure, sufficient funds to meet the wants of these Indians. There are a very considerable number of them, all told, in the neighborhood of 3,500. That is the reason for the increase from $25,000 as last year to $35,000 this year; and in prior years it has been more.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he thinks that this annual appropriation will have to be continued. It seems to be a gratuity.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a gratuity. I think it will have to be continued for some years yet. This much or a very large part of it will have to be continued, in my judgment.

Mr. BURTON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that only 10 per cent of these tribes subsist by labor. I would like to ask whether he is of opinion that the rule is enforced that the Indians, in order to receive rations or other assistance, must render services and perform labor to the amount or the value of the rations distributed.

Mr. SHERMAN. That rule has not been enforced with many Indians.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would object to a general provision requiring the enforcement of that law, or if he knows the reason why the law has not been enforced.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not object to the provision, except that we are then practically becoming administrative officers; we are by legislation providing that the Department shall do that which they are now doing as fast as feasible.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not conceded by the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs that the statute has not been enforced?

Mr. SHERMAN. It has not been enforced in all cases. Perhaps that does not put it strong enough. It has been enforced in some cases only, would perhaps be nearer a correct statement of the fact. It is a very difficult statute to enforce.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

This amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to furnish such articles of food as, from time to time, the condition and necessities of the Indians may require, $15,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to reserve a point of order, Mr. Chairman, on that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, chairman of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, line 11, after the word "the," insert the word "Crow;" so it will read "Crow Indians."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain that to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Ohio.

For many years this item has been included in each appropriation bill, and has been estimated for, but it has been carried under the head of "treaties" in that portion of the bill where treaty provisions for the Crow Indians are included.

It is not a treaty stipulation. This amount was originally paid under treaty stipulation to the Indians, but the time limit provided by the treaty expired. It seemed to be necessary, and still seems to be necessary, to continue the appropriation. The absolute necessities of the Indians seem to require it, but it had no proper place under the treaty provision, and though it was estimated for under the treaty provision, in drawing the bill I transferred it to where it properly should be as a gratuity, and, in printing, the word "Crow" was inadvertently omitted.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman from New York yield to a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BURTON. What is the number of this band of Indians?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not recall the exact number, but will find it in a moment.

Mr. BURTON. Perhaps I can find it. Will the gentleman tell in what State they are situated?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give the gentleman the information in a minute.

Mr. BURTON. I see the number is 1911. It is on page 692 of the report of the Commissioner. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York one or two further questions. Is it not true that under treaty stipulations this tribe receives $45,000 per annum? I find on page 645 of the report for the year 1901 that it is so stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; the Crows have some funds in the Treasury upon which they receive interest.

Mr. BURTON. On trust funds they receive $11,198.02, and also from proceeds of leases, labor, miscellaneous, etc., $30,651.23, making in all $86,849.25; so it appears that they receive approximately $45 per head, man, woman, and child, without this gratuity of $15,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt not the gentleman's figures are correct; but a like appropriation has been made each year. The necessity for its continuance was made apparent at the hearing before the subcommittee which considered the bill. The Indian Commissioner was present and stated that this sum was essential to provide for the needs of the Indians and pay the miscellaneous expenses of the agency.

Mr. BURTON. Can the gentleman state the quantity of land that belongs to the Indians in the way of reservations, and also its quality?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can by referring to the same book which the gentleman has before him.

Mr. BURTON. Do you anticipate that this can be further diminished in the immediate future?

Mr. SHERMAN. I presume that in a very few years this gratuity can be entirely done away with.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was considered, and the amendment agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of Turtle Mountain band of Chippewas, North Dakota, including seeds, $13,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "thirteen" in the paragraph just read and inserting "ten." In connection with this amendment I wish to read briefly from the report of the agent, found on page 295 of the Indian Commissioner's report:

The Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa, as it is termed, should never be considered as a band of Indians. They are half-breeds, quarter breeds, etc., until it is quite impossible for a casual observer to tell that any degree of Indian blood exists among the majority of them, and it is my opinion that if their hopes of a Government settlement were fulfilled, and they were paid off, that they would sink or swim in the same boat with their white competitors. It is true, as the office has often intimated, that a few years back they were self-supporting, independent, neither asking nor receiving aid from any source.

Now, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what circumstances have transpired which have caused these Indians to be less self-supporting now than they were several years since, and whether the granting of these annual gratuities may not have contributed to that condition?

Mr. SHERMAN. The latest report—I do not know whether the gentleman has before him the latest report—states that two years ago these Indians lost their crop, that there was practically a complete failure of the crop—a fact which has set them back for five years; so that of the fund appropriated for the last fiscal year—an appropriation of $13,000—$8,000 was expended for subsistence and nearly $2,000 for agricultural implements. Of the balance, a small portion was expended for employees, and some for drugs, fuel, and "odds and ends" of that kind. The great bulk, however, of the appropriation was expended for subsistence and for the purchase of agricultural implements.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Then, as I understand, the occasion for this appropriation is exceptional destitution because of a failure of the crop of 1902.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, the crop of 1901. The present need is aggravated, if I may use that word, by reason of the failure of that crop.

I think the gentleman is right in a general way in his statement that where we assist the Indians they are apt to do less for themselves; where appropriations have been made year by year and the Indians have learned to rely upon the Government to that extent for their subsistence, they are apt to do less for themselves. As I understand, that is the gentleman's criticism; and I think it is in a measure a correct criticism. But, in the present case at least, it seems to be quite clear that this particular appropriation is needed; and the expenditures of the last year seem to bear out that conclusion.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand that it is the policy of the committee to diminish gradually these gratuities?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; within the time that the membership of the committee has been substantially what it now is the gratuities have been very considerably diminished—very considerably.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true, however, that the income of the Indians from trust funds derived from the sale of lands and similar sources has very greatly increased; also that the income from leasing grazing lands has also increased?

Mr. SHERMAN. The income from the lease of grazing lands and the like has very considerably increased. The increase from additional funds in the Treasury has not been so great; there has been some increase in that way. Almost without exception each year has shown a greater receipt for leased land than the prior year. This does not imply simply that more lands have been leased, but that the administration, perhaps, is better—more progressive; that advanced ideas have been applied in the carrying out of this new policy or new method, producing a greater income from the same amount of land.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment.

[Mr. SMITH of Arizona addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LANDIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 10698. An act providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the Lac Courte Oreille and Lac du Flambeau reservations in the State of Wisconsin; and

H. J. Res. 216. Joint resolution extending the provision granting to the State of Pennsylvania the use of the court-house at Scranton and Williamsport, Pa.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4221) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to extinguish a portion of the alley in square 189.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3243) to redeem certain outstanding certificates of the board of audit of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 7004. An act to extend the time for the completion of a bridge across the Missouri River.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 16604) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, disagreed to by the House of Representative, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. BERRY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of the confederated tribes and bands in middle Oregon, and for pay of employees, $5,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to inquire what are the tribes referred to in that paragraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are half a dozen or more tribes of small membership. I will give the gentleman the names in a moment. There are in Oregon the Clackamas, Cow Creek, Lakmiut, Marys River, Rogue River, Santiam, Umpqua, Wapito, and Yam Hill Indians, all small tribes, and then under the Warm Spring Agency are the Piutes, Warm Springs, and Wallawallas. They are pretty well to do.

There are but a few who require assistance, and they in the main are the old and helpless. During the last fiscal year $1,700 of amount appropriated was expended for the employees in and about the agency, less than six hundred was expended for subsistence, and six hundred for agricultural implements for the Indians, and about $500 in the way of purchasing feed to assist them in maintaining their cattle. There was an unexpended balance in the last fiscal year of about $700 out of this five thousand. Of course, at the end of the fiscal year if there is any balance, as there was last year, it is covered back into the Treasury.

Until two or three years ago the sum provided for in this paragraph had been for many years, if I remember correctly, $10,000. We then reduced it to $8,000, and have since reduced it to $5,000, which seems to be a safe minimum.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask whether the blacksmith and the carpenter are to be compensated from this appropriation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not inform the gentleman the payment of what particular employees are contemplated out of this appropriation. Until three or four or five years ago the law in relation to printing provided that every year a full list of all employees, their compensation, and the various purposes for which the appropriation under the Indian bill were expended, should be set forth in minute detail and published. I have here the last published report, which is seven years old. That is no longer done, and I am not advised just what particular official is there employed, or how much each individual does receive. I had not thought it necessary to ask for that detailed information, and I have not it here. That can be obtained at the Indian office. Until the law in regard to printing was changed we had it before us every year.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Does he anticipate that this appropriation will continue indefinitely, or does he think that we can reduce it in another year?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is about as small as it can be if we are to do anything. It will continue as long as we assist and help any old and decrepit Indians, and that is practically all that we do outside of paying for some white help.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of Digger Indians of California, and for locating them on lands purchased for them, $1,500.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out the last word. This is only $1,500. That seems a very small amount; but I desire to call the attention of the chairman to this tribe of Indians. According to one account, there are 35 of them; according to another account, as set forth in the book I have here, only 25. The agent says of them, on page 192 of the report for 1901:

The Government stock is in good condition; the Government harness needs to be repaired. We need some garden hoes and scythes, the same on hand being worn out.

Then he goes on to tell what the Indians have done during the preceding year:

The Indians in clearing 8 acres of brush and second growth of timber cut therefrom 12 cords of stove wood, which they sold at $3 per cord, besides cutting 45 cords of 4-foot wood for outside parties adjoining the reservation at $1.50 per cord, and other work, such as hauling and putting up hay at $1.25 per day and board.

Had them to plant 3 acres to gardens.

And then he states what will be the harvest of the 3 acres, and there is a statement here to this effect:

The Government buildings consist of 2 dwelling houses, 1 apple house, 1 barn, 1 spring house, 2 stock sheds, and 3 houses built for the Indians, which never have been occupied; all in good condition except apple house.

Now, here is this small tribe of 35 or 25 for which this elaborate provision is made and for which these expenses have been incurred. In addition, a farmer and special disbursing agent is employed for them. Three houses have been built for the Indians, which seem to be unoccupied. They have not thought it worth while to adopt the habits of civilized life sufficiently to use them. At any rate, they are unoccupied. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is a case where we might draw the line, small as it is, as an expression of the committee that these extravagant expenditures must cease.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his amendment. Before the committee agreed to put that amount in the bill the committee went over the items with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It is true that there are only 35 Indians on the reservation. They have a steep, rocky hill reservation consisting of 320 acres. The agent says it is necessary to buy clothing and cooking utensils for these Indians. The amount is very small, and when you pay the superintendent in charge and expend a part in improving the agency, you have but a small sum left for aid and assistance.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of the Apache and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in Arizona and New Mexico, $225,000: Provided, That the unexpended balance for the fiscal year 1903 is hereby appropriated and made available for 1904.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of line 17 the word "two" and insert the word "one;" and I also move to strike out that portion beginning, in line 18, with the word "Provided" and extending to the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17 strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to read, "one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars;" and strike out the proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, so far as the proviso is concerned, I am entirely willing that it be stricken out, because I am advised that in all probability there will be no balance; and if there is any it will be only a matter of four, five, or six thousand dollars at the outside.

There are, Mr. Chairman, covered by this provision, in round numbers, 50,000 Indians. There are nine agencies, with a large number of employees to be paid out of this fund. While it is true there are millions of acres of land in the various reservations in New Mexico and Arizona, it is equally true that on a very large part of those reservations a very large acreage of it would produce just about as much as is capable of being produced in decent earth put in a flowerpot anywhere in the District of Columbia or the State of Ohio.

I described yesterday or the day before something of the condition of a large part of the Navajo Reservation. That condition exists elsewhere. The distinguished gentleman from Arizona, the Delegate from that Territory [Mr. SMITH], who has recently spoken upon another subject, has over and again declared upon this floor that until irrigation was established and until water can be put upon the acreage of many of these reservations no human being could ever produce a single spear of grass, a grain of corn, or a sheaf of wheat. From personal observation of these Indians on some of the reservations it is most astonishing to me that they can produce anything, that it is not necessary for us to furnish them with all they eat and everything they wear. But, in fact, they do produce something from the earth, and they produce largely in the way of money from the sale of their goods, such as blankets, which command in the markets of the world a high price, and the total amount of which I wish they received; but they do not, for, like all other trades, there is a middleman who receives a greater profit, frequently, than the producer. These are not, as a rule, hostile or depraved Indians. They are fairly good Indians in that part of the country. They live in a climate that is enervating and upon lands that do not produce. I believe that they need every cent of this appropriation in order to give them a reasonable per capita amount of help to exist where they are located.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. What are the tribes benefited by this appropriation? If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that I can not find in the report anywhere reference to the expenditure of this money or the tribes for whose benefit it is asked.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course the Navahoes are the largest. Then there are the White Mountain Apaches, the Pueblos, the Pimas, the Quapaws. There are some Apaches in another band—Apaches down on the Gila River. If the gentleman will look in the report under the head of "Population and civilization," in the report of 1900, page 638, he will find the enumeration of all the tribes and the statement of the number of acres in their reservation, and much other data.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the gentleman a further question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. What share of the Indians in the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico are included in this appropriation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Practically all of them. All that are gathered on reservations.

Mr. BURTON. Is it or not true that these Indians, although the soil is so barren and their circumstances so unpromising, subsist by their own labor in larger proportion than other tribes who have been receiving large gratuities from the Government for many years?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not remember what the proportion is, but if the gentleman has looked it up in the report and figured it out he is unquestionably correct. I know they are rather industrious Indians, more industrious than many white people would be if they lived on those reservations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that the reason why these Indians are indigent at the present time is that they have been living for a century tilling the soil by irrigation, and the white men have gone to the heads of the streams next to the mountains, where the most valuable lands are situated, and have used the water which the Indians have been using, and for that reason they are almost at the point of starvation. This appropriation is an absolute necessity.

If the Government will take up the irrigation question and build reservoirs and permit the Indians to become self-sustaining, if the Government will spend a million or two dollars for reservoirs, we can take them off the hands of the Government. The Indians would be happy to do so. They have lived by tilling the soil by means of irrigation, and they can do so again. They have been deprived of the water by the white people, who have gone onto the streams and appropriated a great deal of the water.

Mr. BURTON. I am interested in the information given by the gentleman from Texas. Do I understand that this applies to all the Indians in those two Territories?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; only to a part of them. The Apaches have only recently left the warpath, but it applies to all the Indians known as the Pueblos, the Yumas, and numerous other tribes along the lower valleys of Arizona, and also along the Rio Grande Valley of New Mexico. The Navajos can be included because they live by irrigation. They raise stock, but when there is a serious drought in that country, as there has been for the last two or three years, and in consequence the water dries up, the sheep and cattle die, and the Indians are necessarily helped by the Government. But if the Government could build reservoirs, giving these people a chance to use the water, they could take them off from the Government's hands. Not until then can we do it.

Mr. BURTON. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to page 696 of the report of 1901, where it is stated that 100 per cent of the Indians near Albuquerque subsist by labor in civilized pursuits, and of the Pueblos under the Santa Fe superintendent, 96 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Some little distance west of Albuquerque there is a valley that is naturally irrigated by the streams that run through it, and these bottom lands are quite productive. The Indians that live there have produced cattle and grow hay and sell hay to the United States Army post which is west of there 75 or 100 miles. The Pimas, the Pueblos, and the Papagoes, I think it is, are the Indians that make so much of the pottery, which to my mind, some of it at least, is not only very pretty but beautiful. It shows a considerable amount of taste, if not of art.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And they make the Navaho blankets.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Pueblos and Pimas do not make blankets. Their work is more in the line of pottery. The Navahos make the most beautiful blankets in the world, and for which they obtain, many of them, very large prices.

Mr. BURTON. I will withdraw the first amendment and ask a vote on the second, to strike out that portion of the paragraph beginning with the word "Provided," to which I understand the chairman of the committee has no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. None whatever.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BURTON as modified, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support and civilization of Indians at Fort Berthold Agency, including pay of employees, $50,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$50,000" and inserting "$30,000." There is an important principle involved here, in order to explain which it will be necessary to distinguish between the two classes of annuities given by the Government. One class is the perpetual annuity; the other is limited to a certain number of years—thirty, perhaps. In this particular case it was, I believe, ten years; and the act of 1900 provided for the last of ten installments or annuities.

Now, in this provision, as in many others, it will appear that these terminable annuities were given to the Indians to enable them to become self-supporting and as full compensation for their lands ceded to the Government. But it appears that when the last annuity is paid, instead of the amounts having been husbanded, instead of the money aiding them in self-support, perhaps the very next year—probably at any rate after one or two years—the Government begins to give them gratuities. After having fulfilled its contract and tried for years to make the Indians self-supporting, these gratuities begin.

Now, it would seem that in this case, as well as in several others which are similar, we should establish the policy of gradually diminishing these gratuities, or, what is better, not giving them at all. If my memoranda are correct, the bill of 1902 carried this same appropriation of $50,000; but that of 1901 made no appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. These Indians received a considerable sum annually—$80,000, if my memory is correct—for many years prior to the fiscal year 1892. When the last payment was made under that treaty, they of course dropped at once from the receipt of $80,000 a year to whatever we chose to give them as a gratuity; and we appropriated the first year as a gratuity $50,000. The expectation, of course, is that the appropriation will eventually be reduced. The report of the agent at Fort Berthold—I refer to the report of 1900—I believe the gentleman from Ohio has the later report——

Mr. BURTON. I have the report of 1901.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the time that I made up my figures last December I could not get the report for 1901, and I have a reference to the report of 1900 in which the agent says:

Large tracts of land were planted, but in many cases the seed never sprouted. Where it did appear above ground the growth was sparse and weakly. Our people were so much encouraged by the abundant yield of last year's crop that they all turned out with a will this spring. Now agriculture has received such a blow that it will be several years before they can be again induced to take the same interest in it as has been shown for the past two seasons.

Hay is scarce and of poor quality. Prairie fires have swept over the reservation and surrounding country in all directions. By constant vigilance, burning back fires, plowing fire breaks, and fighting the element whenever and wherever it appeared, enough range has been saved for the cattle. To secure sufficient hay all the time from now until snow flies we shall be fully occupied. One man stated that he had to cut 3 acres of grass to make 1 ton of hay.

The agent thus details the unfortunate circumstances which seem to make it necessary that we should, adopting the policy we have applied in reference to various other Indians, come to the relief of these Indians and save them from practical, yes, actual, starvation.

I think that in another year, unless some providential visitation should prevent the production of any sort of crop, we shall be able to reduce this sum very materially, so that in the progress toward the Indian millennium that the gentleman so much desires, as we all do, it ought not to be many years—and I hope it will not be—before we can do away entirely with any gratuity for these Indians.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to read briefly from the report of the agent in regard to this agency for 1901. On page 304 he says:

The reservation contains 965,120 acres, of which only 80,340 acres have been allotted. Patents for these allotments have been issued from the General Land Office, but the Indians do not seem inclined to accept them.

The population of this tribe is 1,106, and it appears they are the owners of something in excess of 800 acres of land each.

On page 306 the agent makes this further statement:

What policy to pursue with these Indians is a problem that now confronts the Government. The treaty has expired, and the agency will be conducted for the fiscal year 1902 on the amount saved from the ten annual installments of $80,000. They can not exist without some aid, but they will never become self-supporting so long as the issue of rations is continued.

The ration system only encourages laziness and thriftlessness. A man who gets enough to eat and wear without toil does not need to look far ahead. At times it has been impossible to get some of these Indians to haul freight, to mine coal, or to perform any other arduous labor, although the cash was waiting for them when the work was completed. The young men should be compelled by necessity to enter into competition with their white neighbors. If these same white men could have had the advantages and opportunities of the Indians, they would have soon and easily acquired a competence.

Mr. Chairman, I fear that the "millennium" for the Indian will not come until he is put to work and the fact that he must work is emphasized. This agent goes on further to state:

Although these Indians do not wish to dispose of any of their lands, they could well spare a strip 12 miles wide on the northern side of the reservation. This land is suitable for grazing and, as such, is in demand. It would soon be taken by an industrious and desirable class of settlers.

There are upon this reservation vast fields of lignite coal. Mines have never been properly developed so as to show the best quality, but doubtless it is as good as any in the lignite region.

In fact, this is a wealthy tribe; yet every year we are proposing to award them $50,000. It seem to me we might, at least as a beginning, reduce this amount to $30,000 for this year. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. The statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that these Indians have an acreage of something like 800 acres per capita, I think he read, of course to us who live in New York or Ohio seems to indicate that they have sufficient, that each individual would have opportunity not only to sustain himself better than he would be sustained in any hotel in Washington, perhaps better than most of us live, but that it would take a very short time before he would become wealthy. Now, any person who has traveled to any great extent over some of the Western States—parts of Montana, the Territory of Arizona, Idaho, or the Territory of New Mexico—will discover that the more land a man owns there the poorer he is.

I remember of hearing an anecdote of some one riding through the Western States many years ago and seeing a native fencing a piece of ground. He said to him, "My friend, what in the world are you fencing that land in for? Cattle would starve on that." The answer of the native was, "Why, stranger, I know that; and I am afencing of it in to keep my cattle out."

Now, that is the condition of thousands and millions of acres on many of these reservations, so that the mere fact that an Indian tribe has 800, or perhaps 8,000 acres per capita is no indication that they could produce from those 800 or 8,000 acres enough to sustain a yellow dog. If the gentleman would make his amendment not quite so sweeping and offer to make it at $40,000 I would be inclined to join hands with him and let it be fixed at that sum.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I should be very glad to accede to the proposition of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so changed. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to reduce it by the sum of $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education and civilization of the Indians of the Fort Peck Agency in Montana, including pay of employees, $65,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, in that paragraph I offer an amendment, to strike out the word "sixty-five" and insert the word "fifty." I want to read briefly what the agent says in regard to that agency on pages 264 and 265 of the report for 1901. There are two tribes here, one of Assiniboins and the other of Yanktons, and they number in all 1,802.

The reservation is situated in the extreme northeastern portion of Montana and contains about 4,000 square miles. It is not adapted for agriculture but it is an excellent stock-growing country. It is well watered and fairly well timbered.

On the next page the agent, under the head of "Recommendations," says:

I would respectfully renew my recommendation mentioned in my report of last year, that the Government purchase the entire reservation from the Indians and abandon this agency. The proceeds, in case this was done, should be paid direct to the Indians, if they were able to use it, or in case it was desirable to have them sent to some other reservation, could be added to the funds of the reservation to which they were sent. The Assiniboin should be sent to Fort Belknap and the Yanktons to Standing Rock Agency. This could be done as well as not, and this agency wiped off the face of the earth. This is not a new recommendation by any means, and does not emanate entirely from myself. I believe it was made years ago by General Heth and General Armstrong.

Now, it seems they are occupying 4,000 square miles of land—not good arable land, but good for grazing. It would seem that $36 a piece, or $180 a family, for a tribe having 4,000 square miles of land—land which no doubt could be sold for a considerable sum—was not only demonstrating that this is a benevolent Government, but that it is very lavish in its dealings with the Indians, and I really hope the gentleman from New York will agree to the amendment proposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to agree with the gentleman to a limited extent. This tribe had a large sum of money under the treaty provisions—$165,000 a year, if my memory serves me correct. That ran out some time ago. The last payment was made three years ago, and we made them the first year under the bill a gratuity of $75,000. Last year we dropped to $65,000. I suggest to my friend that it would be a rather large reduction to drop it now to $50,000 from $65,000. Still, I will not strenuously oppose his amendment. I simply make the suggestion that it would be better to drop it a little less than $15,000. We reduced it $10,000 two years ago; let us reduce it $10,000 now.

Mr. BURTON. I will agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be changed so as to read to strike out the word "sixty-five" and insert the word "fifty-five." The question is on the amendment as so amended.

The question was taken and the amendment agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support, civilization, and instruction of the Klamaths, Modocs, and other Indians of the Klamath Agency, Oreg., including pay of employees, $5,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the formal amendment there to strike out the paragraph. I should like to inquire whether this is an increase or a decrease in the amount appropriated and for how long these appropriations have continued?

Mr. SHERMAN. That has been the same amount for three years. I have no memoranda here back of that. My recollection is that, perhaps five or six years ago, we reduced that from $7,000 to $5,000. For three years it has been the same. That sum is used in paying agency employees and for the support and care of a few old and a few sick Indians; that is all. These Indians, as a whole, are self-supporting. There are thousands of them.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of agricultural implements, and support and civilization of Joseph's band of Nez Percé Indians, $4,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out "four" and insert "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 27, strike out "four" and insert "two."

Mr. BURTON. I desire to read from what the local agent says in regard to this tribe on page 385 of the report for 1901:

I am glad to report, too, that Chief Joseph's band of Nez Percés has done more work and has been less troublesome than ever before, this, in my opinion, having been a direct and logical result of reducing rations—a process which I am inclined to push further. These people are located in the Nespelim Valley, where ordinary industry and thrift would soon make them not only comfortable, but wealthy; but having for years past been given rations and other annuities as reward for atrocious crimes, they have been lazier, more worthless, and less progressive than any other Indians under my jurisdiction.

Now, I have not just at hand the amount that has been paid to these Indians in prior years, but I think, however, that for two or three years it has been $4,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. For three years.

Mr. BURTON. And we have here the unequivocal recommendation of the agent that there ought to be a reduction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of the Ponca Indians, including pay of employees, $15,000: Provided, That this amount shall be divided pro rata among all the members of said tribe in Oklahoma Territory and in Nebraska and Dakota.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the pro forma amendment to strike out the paragraph, and ask if that means that their lands have been allotted? Also, does it mean that they have become self-supporting?

Mr. SHERMAN. The expectation is that they will become self-supporting. The lands have largely been allotted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw the amendment?

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of Shoshone Indians in Wyoming, $30,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-five."

As I understand, this was $25,000 last year. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from New York whether there is any reason for the additional $5,000 this year?

Mr. SHERMAN. These Indians until last year received $5,000 a year under what is called the Hot Springs treaty. Last year they received their last payment, and the agent states that they have nothing else in the world to get along with. They are in a pretty hard condition, and that is the reason th[illegible] we were asked to give the $5,000 additional appropriation. It was upon that statement that we acceded to the request for the increase of $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla tribes, Oregon, including pay of employees, $5,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out that paragraph, and I will ask the necessity for that appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is used, I think, entirely for the pay of additional employees at the agencies. There may be a small portion of it that is used for assisting a few old and some sick Indians. In the main these Indians are self-supporting. The assistance we give them is very slight, and it is extended to a very few. I think it is wisdom to leave it there; and yet I do not consider it of sufficient consequence to oppose vehemently its going out. I think it is wisdom to leave it.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to read briefly from the report upon these tribes. It appears from the report from which I have read, that for 1901, page 645, that these tribes have another source of income, namely, interest on trust funds, which amounts to $9,795.26 a year. In regard to the Umatilla tribe it says, on page 352:

These Indians are advantageously situated, and there is no reason why they should not be self-supporting. This season has been favorable, and large crops are assured. The allotted lands are being rapidly developed into fine farms, considerable revenue being derived therefrom. Products find a ready market at home, and, taken all in all, these Indians have no just cause for complaint. While the Indian is naturally adapted to stock raising, agriculture seems to agree with him. Nearly all the more progressive allottees have gardens, in which they raise ample vegetables for their own use.

I will read another brief paragraph from the agent's report, on page 352, beginning with the word "discontinued," as not only applicable to this amendment, but also as stating a general fact of importance as regards all of these reservations:

The positions of carpenter and blacksmith at this agency have been discontinued, and no bad results have been remarked. These mechanical branches tended to make the Indians more dependent upon the Government, and without free repairing they are more careful to protect their vehicles and implements. While these shops were in operation much property belonging to white men was brought in by the Indians to be repaired under claim that it was their own, and constant vigilance was necessary to detect these impositions.

I really think that agent is entitled to our commendation for pointing out a fact which is perfectly plain when stated, and which would apply in almost every case. It discloses a just criticism to be made on the policy of the Government in regard to blacksmiths and carpenters. Some treaties have been made providing these helpers in perpetuity, which is virtually saying to the Indians or the Indian tribes: "You need a blacksmith; you need a carpenter. We will furnish one. But in order to absolutely remove any incentive for your learning either one of these trades for yourselves, we will agree that a blacksmith and carpenter shall be with you always." It seems to me that it is very desirable that an amendment should be offered here, so that as soon as possible they may be taught to provide for themselves. And as the blacksmith and carpenter in this instance have been discontinued, I think there can be no serious objection to a reduction, or, perhaps, to striking out the whole amount of $5,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has elaborated in detail a statement which I made, that these Indians are largely self-supporting and well to do. But, Mr. Chairman, we know that in every community of white people there are some few indigent persons. I know of no minor civil division or county that does not maintain what is called a "poorhouse," to care for some of those who have no means physically or otherwise to care for themselves or to provide themselves with subsistence; and while the Umatilla have funds, there are other Indians—the Wallawalla and the Cayuse—that do not have any funds to draw upon. The indigent are dependent upon charity. They must either be supported by our charity or the charity of their fellows, for which their fellows are not specially noted. I would not oppose an amendment which would reduce this appropriation by half, for instance, or a couple of thousand, but think it better not be stricken out entirely.

Mr. BURTON. Whatever the chairman of the committee thinks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that it be reduced to $3,000.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be withdrawn; and I will offer an amendment to line 14 that the word "five" be stricken out and the word "three" be substituted therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws the amendment pending and offers another amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14 strike out "five" and insert "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of Yakimas and other Indians at said agency, including pay of employees, $8,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "eight," in line 17, and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 17, strike out the word "eight" and insert "five."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to ask the chairman why he offers that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer it because we appropriated $8,000 for the last fiscal year, and of the appropriation less than $5,000 was expended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. All I know is that two or three years ago this was cut down to $5,000, and they did not have money enough with which to run their sawmill and had to close down.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of the $8,000 appropriated in 1902, $4,933 was expended and $3,066 was turned into the Treasury.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If that is all that is needed, there is no objection to it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nevada: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service in Nevada, including traveling expenses of agents, and support and civilization of Indians located on the Piute, Walker River, and Pyramid Lake reservations, $8,000; and pay of employees, including physician at the Walker River Reservation, at $600, $4,900; in all $12,900.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph for the purpose of making an inquiry. Why do these items for California, Nevada, and Oregon combine appropriations for general incidental expenses with those for support and civilization? Why are not these latter included under the general head of "Miscellaneous supports and gratuities?"

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no general appropriation for Nevada. There are not many Indians there that require assistance. Of the fund only $2,400 was expended last year for subsistence and $2,500 for agricultural implements and seed and one thing and another of that character for assisting the Indians, $200 for clothing, three or four hundred dollars for medicine, and something like two or three hundred dollars for the care of the insane Indians. There was a balance of a few hundred dollars out of last year's appropriation. The balance, however, was small, and it would appear that the appropriation is not greater than the requirements.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to ask the gentleman for how long a time have these items been combined for these three States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Several years, to my recollection. I can not say just when they were put in that form, but I could look it up and tell the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, it is of no consequence. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Washington: For general incidental expenses of the Indian Service in Washington, including traveling expenses of agents and support and civilization of Indians at Colville and Puyallup agencies, and for pay of employees, $17,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is another incongruity here. There is an appropriation in some paragraphs for general incidental expenses, including traveling expenses of agents, while in others there is added "and for pay of employees." What is the reason these appropriations for pay of employees are not carried under the respective heads where these appropriations are made?

Mr. SHERMAN. In some cases there are other provisions for the pay of employees, and it does not come out of these appropriations for incidental expenses. Without the specific authority to pay employees out of these incidental appropriations, I understand the Auditor does not pass the payment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

For salaries of four commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, $20,000: Provided, That said Commission shall exercise all the powers heretofore conferred upon it by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment:

Amend by adding at the end of line 13, page 31, the following language:

"And in addition thereto said Commission is hereby empowered and directed to enter upon negotiations with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, in the Indian Territory, for the purchase by the United States of the coal and asphalt lands belonging to said tribes, the same being the lands authorized to be segregated and sold under the provisions of the agreement made between the United States and the said tribes, and approved the 1st day of July, 1902; and any agreement made with said tribes looking to the purchase of said lands or any part thereof shall stipulate the terms of such purchase and provide that the same shall be held in trust by the United States and sold and disposed of upon such terms and conditions as shall be provided by Congress, and from the sums realized from such sale the Government shall be first reimbursed for such expenditure, and the remainder to be set apart for the support of free schools in the Indian Territory for the education of all children in said Territory, whether Indians or not Indians.

"Any agreement made under the authority hereby conferred shall be subject to the ratification and approval of Congress."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, for the time being I reserve the point of order to that amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a short time on the pending amendment. First, as to the question of the point of order, I do not think it is well taken, because the very provision that we seek to amend is a provision in the bill giving certain powers to the Commission to negotiate with these Indians. While I was not the author of the amendment as offered, I did offer in the committee an amendment providing for the purchase of these lands, or a portion thereof, for the purpose of endowing the common schools to be hereafter established in the Indian Territory. The amendment which I offered and hope to see ultimately adopted is as follows;

Amend by adding at the end of line 13, page 31, the following language:

"And in addition thereto said commission is hereby empowered and directed to enter upon negotiations with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians in the Indian Territory for the purchase by the United States of the coal and asphalt lands belonging to said tribes, the same being the lands authorized to be segregated and sold under the provisions of the agreement made between the United States and the said tribes and approved the 1st day of July, 1902; and any agreement made with said tribes looking to the purchase of said lands, or any part thereof, shall stipulate the terms of such purchase and provide that the same shall be held in trust by the United States, and disposed of upon such terms and conditions as shall be provided by Congress, for the support of free schools in the Indian Territory for the education of all children in said Territory, whether Indians or not Indians.

"Any agreement made under the authority hereby conferred shall be subject to the ratification and approval of Congress."

I would be glad to have the attention of the House just a moment, for I know how difficult it is for members who are not connected directly with this legislation to understand conditions and draw the proper distinctions between the conditions in the Territory proper and the various reservations about which this bill legislates. First, the Government appropriates no money for the education of the Indians in the Indian Territory. They are supported from the annuities and incomes of their own property. At the last Congress a supplemental treaty was ratified with these tribes authorizing the segregation of 500,000 acres of coal and asphalt land and providing for its sale at public auction in the next two years from the date of the ratification of the treaty.

These lands belong to the Indians. They owned them in fee simple. The purpose of the amendment is, in the first place, to extinguish by consent of the tribe the title of the Indians to this property. I believe we ought to do that, and do it without reimbursement of the Government. But adopting the committee suggestion, this amendment authorizes the reimbursement of the Government in the event these lands should be purchased.

In the first place, there is a provision for the sale of these lands in the treaty of 1902. It is believed by many that the Government, by negotiation with the Indian tribes owning this property, the Choctaws and Chickasaws, can purchase it at less than can be realized out of it by the Government and at the same time pay the Indians as much as will be realized out of it under the sale provided for under the agreement of 1902. If the amendment is adopted, the Indians could afford to take less, as they would share in the school fund. It is also believed by many, in which sentiment I concur in a limited degree, that the Government could then sell and dispose of this property under proper regulations and have a surplus for the endowment of public schools in that country after reimbursing the Government.

It has been said here, Why not make a direct appropriation for the support of common schools of this country? That has been tried and failed. That will never be accomplished, in my opinion, by Congress, but here is the proposition, if Congress will take hold of it, and without any abuse of power it can, within the limits of conservatism, to provide a school fund for these people in common with all the States and Territories which have had endowments out of the public lands heretofore.

The conditions in that country as to schools are not only lamentable, but are a disgrace to the American Congress. We spend thousands of dollars for the education of the Indians upon the reservation, for education in the Philippines, for education in Porto Rico, and for various other benevolent purposes. In the Indian country there are now, on a conservative estimate, 200,000 school children between the ages of 5 and 20 years. Of these children, including Indians, including those who live in towns where they have the power to levy a tax and have limited school privilege, there is to-day——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I should like to have ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I was just saying that there are to-day in the Indian country, I think, on a conservative estimate, 125,000 children between the ages of 5 and 20 whose names are not enrolled in any school—public, private, Indian, or otherwise. This is a condition which, to my mind, ought to appeal to Congress—not to its liberality, but to its sense of justice and its duty toward these children. Of all the children, some thirty-odd thousand are Indians, some 18,000 negroes, the others white children. The pending provision seeks to establish an endowment for the education of all the children—Indian and those not Indian. The Indians have a separate school fund; but this would put that country on the road looking toward a uniform school system in that country. The Indians have limited school facilities; but in that country there is not any system of free schools open to the white children, and, being without government, the people there are powerless to establish one.

The Government last year sent an agent to the Indian country to investigate educational conditions, and the statements which I have here are based largely on his report. This country embraces 31,000 square miles of territory. There are more than half a million of people there, powerless to maintain a school system, owing to the peculiar condition of the country, in the absence of Congressional legislation. This agent visited one of the jails in that country, and he submits this statement:

> On October 2, 1901, I visited the United States jail in the northern judicial district, and of the 284 inmates on that day, 65 who could speak English admitted to me that they could neither read nor write, and nearly all of these were young men and women. And the same condition of affairs could be found in the other jails of the Territory.

This gives only a glimpse of the unfortunate condition existing in that country. Here we have 125,000 children with no law under which a school tax can be maintained, dependent entirely upon the little schools that their parents may be able to establish. This is the character of citizenship that we are building up. The records of the jails in that country bear testimony, I may say, to the lack of action on the part of Congress; a condition for which we can not escape responsibility; and the longer it is permitted to exist the greater will be our shame.

Though this measure may not afford much relief in the way in which it is offered, I wish the gentleman from Illinois, rather than interpose a point of order, would move an amendment to the paragraph so as to direct the Commission to negotiate with the people of the Five Tribes with the view of extinguishing the title of that property, and with the further view of making an endowment for the support of common schools in that great country. [Applause.] I believe that there can be no act more plainly demanded by considerations of justice and sound public policy, and that no act of this Congress would go further to meet the unfortunate condition of those people.

I do not know what further I can say in support of this proposition in the few minutes remaining to me. The facts I have stated stand without contradiction, are admitted facts. I believe it is the duty of Congress to take some step looking to the establishment and endowment of schools in that country. I say this without regard to the question whether that portion of the country be made an organized Territory under the proposed legislation pending here, or whether it becomes a separate State, or whether it becomes part of another State, or whether it remain in its present condition; our duty to my mind is equally plain.

I hope the amendment may be adopted, and I further hope that before this bill leaves the legislative halls of this Congress we shall meet in a courageous and just manner the conditions in that country and acquire this land as an inheritance to bless the poor children of that Territory and lay the foundations of a magnificent citizenship.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask just a question or two to see whether I understand this provision, to determine whether I shall insist on the point of order, if I may be indulged. As I understand it, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] will correct me if I am wrong, there are about 500,000 acres of land referred to.

Mr. LITTLE. Just 500,000 acres.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it further, there is an agreement now between these Indians, the Choctaws and the Chickasaws, and the United States that after the allotments are made to the Choctaws and the Chickasaws these 500,000 acres shall be sold by the United States for the benefit of these Indians.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will permit, he is substantially correct. The provision is this: It does not wait for the allotment. The agreement of 1902 provides that these 500,000 acres of land shall be segregated. That precedes the allotment, and then they are sold after two years, the purchase money, of course, going to these two tribes of Indians to whom the land belongs.

Mr. CANNON. And the Indian gets his money when he parts with the land?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that is in a very desirable condition as it is. Now, this amendment, as I understand it, when we ratify the new treaty negotiated with the Indians, looks to the Government of the United States paying from the Treasury for this land whatever price may be agreed upon by the Indians and the United States; and then, if the United States is unable to buy them of the Indians for less than they are worth, the United States will sell the lands, first, to reimburse the United States; second, that after the United States is reimbursed, presuming we can cheat the Indians in the price, whatever is left shall be devoted to schools.

Mr. LITTLE. That is a correct statement of the situation, except we do not want to cheat the Indians. I would like to suggest, if my friend will permit, at this point that, as I understand it, some of the Indians themselves—but they have not done it officially—seek this proposition for this reason: They recognize, as we do, that in the near future there must be a union of the schools in that country, the Indian school and the white school.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Whatever system may be adopted, they believe as they would share in the participation of the common schools that would be benefited under this provision, should it pass, they would be willing to sell the property at less actually than it is worth.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if they would come to us with a proposition to donate half of these lands to the common schools I would be very glad of it, or if they want the United States to supplement that position when they donate that by appropriating an equal amount from the Treasury, it would perhaps commend itself to my judgment, but this looks to an agreement by which the United States presumably counting the lands as worth what—$3 an acre?

Mr. LITTLE. At least that.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that would be a million and a half we would pay for the 500,000 acres, and the moment we would get at it somebody would jump up and say in the interests of the poor man that it must come under substantially the homestead provision, and that he must have a chance to pay for it under that provision or some other. The result would be that the United States would be out from one million and a half to two millions or three millions of dollars; second, that it would be open then and in the end devoted to free homes; third, we would have parted with our money to the Indians, the United States would not be reimbursed, and the school fund would still be up in the air.

Now, let us meet this matter of free schools in the Indian Territory when it is admitted as a State, if you choose, in a proper way. If we ought to take something out of the United States Treasury for a free school fund, let us do it without any roundabout proposition, because as the wheel revolves every time, nobody looking after the interests of the United States, the United States Treasury loses and the school fund does not gain. Now, this is new legislation, and therefore it is not in order upon a general appropriation bill, and I make the point of order against it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in addition——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to speak to the point of order?

Mr. LITTLE. No, only indirectly. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending and a motion to strike out is not in order.

Mr. LITTLE. Then I will address myself for a moment to the point of order. The provision in this bill which is sought to be amended by the amendment reads as follows:

For salaries of 4 commissioners appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, $20,000: Provided, That said Commission shall exercise all the powers heretofore conferred upon it by Congress.

That is legislation itself. It is conferring upon this Commission a continuation of its powers, which among others is a power to negotiate agreements, a power to allot lands, etc. The whole Indian country is really under their control, and this amendment proposes, in addition to these powers, to negotiate along the lines indicated in this amendment.

It occurs to me, while I am not a very skilled parliamentarian, that the amendment is directly in line with the legislation contained in the bill, because the bill continues the powers of the Dawes Commission or the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, and this amendment is only an enlargement or a specification of the powers that the bill carries. I can not see how it could be in antagonism to the rules of the House as not being germane, because the very amendment carries with it the power of this Commission, which power is quite extensive and large under existing law, and only seeks to direct the execution of that power.

Mr. CANNON. This runs exactly as it has run for many years. There was legislation creating this Commission. There was legislation that brought about the status in the Indian Territory. That was independent of an appropriation bill. Perhaps this proviso could be stricken out and not change the sense of the appropriation; but if this proviso be legislation, why, here is legislation entirely new. It is not germane. In the first place, it is legislation that confers power upon a commission to be appointed, and is entirely outside of any scheme that there is under existing law.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the part of the bill to which my amendment is proposed, admitting it to be existing law, is reenacted in this bill. No point of order has been made against it. I do not know whether it is in the exact language of former legislation—whether that has been limited or not. Therefore I think it entirely germane and that the Chairman should sustain the amendment which has been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the proviso—has no effect upon the status and power and authority of the Commission created by the act of 1895. It does not seek to repeal any of their authority, and if the authority exists, they can exercise it without this proviso. Therefore, this proviso has no effect upon this bill, or upon the subject-matter of the bill. Now, if the powers sought to be conferred by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] are now within the scope and authority of the Commission, then there is no necessity for this legislation. But the Chair thinks that this is going a great way beyond the existing authority of the Commission, and undertaking to confer upon them an additional authority, broad in its scope and important in its details. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order that this is an attempt to change existing law, or rather to enact new legislation upon appropriation bills, is well taken, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the Chairman's attention to the fact that, admitting that the proviso is existing law, yet we have an appropriation here carrying these commissioners, and it does appear to me that the amendment directing their duties would be competent legislation even on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will allow the Chair to suggest——

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. That this proviso does not confer any additional power upon the Commission, and could not do it in that way. The existing law is not repealed by this proviso. It is neither added to nor subtracted from. The existing law, whatever it may be—the Chair is not familiar with it—stands, and no additional force is given to it by this proviso. So that is not any attempt to change existing law. If it is an attempt to do anything, it is an attempt to reiterate that the existing law shall continue to be existing law.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, I should like for a moment to say that the amendment offered, admitting the proviso to be existing law, directs among other things how they shall proceed, under the power given, in one particular mentioned in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That changes the existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of commissioners and necessary expenses of employees, and $3 per diem for expenses of a clerk detailed as a special disbursing agent by the Interior Deparment while on duty with the Commission shall be paid therefrom; for clerical help, including secretary of the Commission and interpreters (act of March 3, 1901, vol. 31, p. 1074, sec. 1), $200,815; contingent expenses of the Commission (same act), $2,000: Provided further, That this appropriation may be used by said Commission in the prosecution of all work to be done by or under its direction as required by law; in all, $222,815: And provided further, That not to exceed $10,400 of the above amount may be used in the temporary employment in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of 4 clerks, at the rate of $1,600 per annum; 1 clerk, at the rate of $1,400, and who shall be competent to examine records in disputed citizenship cases and law contests growing out of the work of said Commission, and in the temporary employment in said office of 3 competent stenographers, at the rate of $1,000 each per annum.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Before any amendment is offered, I wish to make the point of order against the third proviso, commencing in line 3 and ending with "per annum," in line 12. I think, if my friend will allow me to state it, he will at once confess the point. I call his attention to the fact that this seems to have been gathered up in the legislative bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. These are not in the legislative bill. Those provided for in the legislative bill are on page 33 and page 34, and I have an amendment to have those stricken out.

Mr. CANNON. Let us see about that a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend is mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. No, I think not; if my friend will take and examine it he will find.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is for the allotment of land. That on page 33, line 13, is not under the Dawes Commission at all.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will ask unanimous consent later on to return to this item, with the privilege of making the point of order upon it if I desire to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is entirely agreeable to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to this part of the bill at a future time, leaving the matter of the point of order undisposed of. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21 strike out "four" and insert the word "eight."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the point of order pending to the proviso is not disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume that the gentleman will not object to the amendment. It is to correct the addition. I will ask unanimous consent that that change be made, to correct the addition. That is all it is, and the point of order will be pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that both the amendment and the point of order ought to go together.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. BURTON. I move to amend lines 21 and 22, on page 31, by striking out "$200,815" and inserting in lieu thereof "$93,000," being the amount, I believe, appropriated in the preceding bill. Pending that motion, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York to explain the reasons for this very considerable increase; also how long he believes it will be before the work of this Commission will be completed.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman will turn to the Book of Estimates of the present year, on page 448—and if he has not the book I will send it to him—he will find a full statement, in great detail, by the Dawes Commission, stating just how each dollar of this appropriation is to be expended. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I have a letter from the chairman of the Dawes Commission, under date of January 12, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
COMMISSION TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES,
Muskogee, Ind. T., January 12, 1903.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your recent letter requesting a statement of the present condition of the work of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, of the amount of money that will probably be needed to complete the work, and desiring to know when the work can reasonably be expected to be completed.

In reply thereto I have the honor to say, in the first place, that, broadly speaking, the agreements passed by Congress and ratified by the three larger tribes—the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees—during the past year have finally paved the way to the full consummation of the plan of settlement first inaugurated by the Curtis bill of June 28, 1898.

Under other agreements, and under the Curtis and subsequent acts of Congress, the affairs of the Seminole and Creek nations are now, practically speaking, completed and closed, with the exception of certain minor matters not necessary to consider in the present connection.

But, while certain agreements were recognized as necessary supplements to the Curtis Act, yet, as respects all this work, including, of course, the three great tribes now under consideration, that act adopted and enjoined a definite policy and imposed upon the Commission certain labors in pursuance thereof. Congress has made regular appropriations in this connection, and when the recent agreements with the greater tribes came into effect, the preparatory work was, under the urgency of the Department and the Commission, in the main finished, and thus the Commission, as a result of such preliminary expenditures and labor, is ready for and has now begun the exercise of the new powers therein granted.

In other words, the approximately 16,000,000 acres of land of these three remaining tribes are now surveyed, classed, valued, and platted down to 40-acre units, a necessary preliminary to the dividing of these tribal estates into shares of equal value, as required by law. Surveys of the location of the houses and other improvements of every citizen in most of the thickly settled parts of these areas are now made and platted, in order that the homestead and occupancy rights provided by law may be duly regarded.

Passing from the present status of what may be termed an inventory, appraisement, and location of the property to be divided with equality of value among these people, and coming to the even larger work of determining who are the rightful citizens or heirs entitled to inherit under this governmental administration of these tribal estates, I have to say that during the past few months we have, preparatory to opening land offices in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee nations, rapidly forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, for his final approval, as provided by law, the results of our former work of this character.

To speak more specifically, we have recently sent to the Department and received the Department's approval of our favorable findings as to 24,500 Cherokee citizens, leaving about 14,500 Cherokee applications for enrollment yet to be finally passed upon and reported by us. Of course the latter cases are in the main completed, and no new applications can now be received, and they are only waiting for our final disposition as rapidly as we can get at them.

Of the Choctaws and Chickasaws jointly, we have recently forwarded and received the Department's approval of our favorable findings as to 11,020 citizens, with favorable findings as to 3,998 claimants now pending before the Department, a total forwarded of these tribes of 15,118, and leaving, say, 15,870 of such claimants yet to be passed on by us, or, if passed upon, as part of them are, yet to be reported by us to the Department. As in the case of the Cherokees, these matters are being pressed to conclusion as rapidly as possible.

The total number of findings thus forwarded within the past few months is, say, 39,618, leaving, say, 30,370 yet to be reported.

Thus, since the passage of these agreements, enabling us to take final action, we have proceeded to put into final shape and close up the results of several years of our labors of taking and adjudicating the applications of claimants to the right of enrollment.

No account is taken in this statement of the many thousands of claimants whose applications have been passed upon and rejected further than to say that since our last report a vast amount of this material has been cleared away, all of which is, of course, preparatory and necessary to the final and rightful administration and partition of the tribal estates.

Itemized statements of all expenditures have been duly made to the Department, as required by law, and it is presumed that you do not want such details in this letter, especially as they are, down to recent dates, already available at Washington.

Inclosed is a detailed estimate of expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1904, given by us to the Secretary of the Interior under date of September 20, 1902.

As for the $40,000 deficiency for the present fiscal year, I inclose, explanatory thereof, copy of the Commission's letter of November 13, 1902, to the Secretary of the Interior.

You will observe that this deficiency arises solely from our opening the three allotment offices in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee nations, respectively, in the present fiscal year, and consequently earlier than was expected. It arises from our anticipating the work of next year. We are proceeding with these offices, having opened the Cherokee office at Vinita the 2d of this month and are making all necessary preparations to open the Choctaw and Chickasaw offices February 1, or as soon thereafter as practicable. Under our own urgency, and under the constant urgency of the Department, with a due regard by all for efficiency and economy, we have pressed and are pressing the work. We do not consider for a moment that Congress would pardon the keeping of material acquired at great cost unutilized or sanction a policy that protracted the unsettled and unprofitable condition of affairs in this Territory.

It may be stated that in pressing the citizenship cases to settlement we had to expend a much larger amount of our present appropriation in the employment of law clerks and stenographers than we anticipated; and, owing to the remarkably inclement character of much of the past year, our field work has necessarily been more expensive than is ordinarily the case. Nevertheless we have pressed the work beyond expectations and kept within our estimates, except, of course, as respects the entirely new work of the three allotment offices to be covered by the $40,000 of so-called deficiency. We have reduced our force and closed out material as branches of the work were completed, the total force being now 250 as compared with 425 on April 1, 1901, and since the latter date we have turned into the general fund of the Treasury proceeds of stock and material no longer required, amounting to $19,123.75.

As to how long it will take to complete this work, and what additional amount of money it will take, I have to say that we have entertained, and perhaps expressed, the hope that we could substantially finish the work in something like two years from the opening of the three new allotment or land offices previously referred to as now being opened in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee nations; while as to cost we have ventured the estimate that $150,000 will cover the expense for the fiscal year following that ending June 30, 1904, at the end of which fiscal year, viz, June 30, 1905, a new and further view may be obtainable of the work, or, in other words, it may then be practicable to wind up the remnants of this work without reference to this Commission.

But it is absolutely necessary to differentiate between the work Congress undertook here and that which it has often authorized and had executed under the "drawing" or "first come first served" plan of disposing of lands acquired for general settlement. This work is not that. This is administering upon an estate of, say, 80,000 heirs and 20,000,000 acres of land. Every heir must be determined, as well as a vast army of false or unqualified claimants, by regular judicial proceedings, and every acre of land has had to be reasonably valued. In character and magnitude combined, this work is perhaps without a precedent in human experience or history. To allot these lands with respect to value and in detail, and to reconcile all rights and disputes arising therefrom, is as much an undertaking as to sell it in parcels and divide the money equally among the heirs.

When we consider the further task of determining who are the heirs, certainly no prudent man could or can give exact estimates of the total of either time or money. Only recently Congress provided a special court of three judges to consider complications relating to, comparatively speaking, only a small group of claimants in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, arising under the law of June 10, 1896. We are subject to delay until that work is determined, also until the Delaware case can pass through the higher courts, and we are troubled by injunction as to Cherokee freedmen, etc. Thus conditions arise continually which compel you to revise any opinion, in one respect or another, that you may form.

You become dependent upon what other people have to do, and it is difficult to judge of that. If I were forced to express an opinion now, I would say that this business will likely have to run two years longer than I have heretofore hoped, and at a probable cost to the Government of, say, $150,000 a year. But this we do know, that we are at the beginning of the end; that under the Curtis law and supplemental legislation, and under the present administration of the Interior Department, the foundation has already been laid deep and strong, and the principal walls already erected, of a great community, equal in extent to the State of Indiana, second in resources to none, and destined in the early future to afford homes to millions of people, and to supply profitable trade to millions more.

It matters little whether, when the main work is done, as soon it will be, Congress shall dispense with this organization and enlarge others or institute a new one to wind up the remnants of work until such time as local courts and other machinery may be established and available for the purpose. But, without going into details, I venture the opinion that when all is done, and this estate, worth now commercially from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000, is finally administered upon, it will be at a cost unrivaled in the smallness of the percentage of the capital disbursed, and unsurpassed as a monument to the wisdom and justice of the Government.

I have shown this to Commissioners Needles and Breckinridge, and they concur in what I have said.

Very respectfully,

TAMS BIXBY,
Acting Chairman.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask whether the amounts expended under this appropriation are to be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds of the lands or from any other source?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no provision for reimbursement.

Mr. BURTON. Under what statute or treaty are these expenditures to be made?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not made under any statute or treaty. They are made in pursuance of several treaties or agreements. We call them all agreements now. It has been desired many, many years that there should be a changed condition in the Indian Territory. It is a very, very rich Territory, rich in soil, in minerals, and lumber; and in every way the conditions were abominable. Crime was rampant. More murderers have been unprosecuted in that Territory than in any State or half a dozen States in the country. White people, a very large number, went into the Territory; progress was blocked absolutely there; and it has been the wish during years that we enter into some agreement by which the tribal relations could be done away with, so that the lands could be allotted in severalty, town sites could be provided, and that civilization could enter there and progress be made for the good of the Indians and the good of the country.

In 1893 the first treaty was entered into, under which there were to be surveys, allotments, and the laying out of town sites. Provisions were made for safeguarding the Indian rights to minerals, coal, oil, and all that sort of thing. Subsequent treaties have been made, and it is carrying out the policy inaugurated in these treaties that we have expended all this money in the Territory. It is bringing about a condition that is very gratifying and satisfactory. More white people are going in there, the lands are being opened up, they are being tilled, all their wonderful productiveness is being exploited.

This Commission is pressing forward near to the completion of their work. They have reached a point where, in my judgment, the country is better fitted for statehood than some other portions of our Republic, for whose admission as States the House has already voted. We have expended a very large amount of money. The item in the last bill was more than twice the amount appropriated for the coming year. This bill carries $115,000, and last year's $324,000; the year before $524,000. We had nearly reached the completion of the work that was assigned to the Commission when the treaties of last year were confirmed by act of Congress and by subsequent acts of the Cherokee and Choctaw nations.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Are these appointees from the civil service?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; all outside of the civil service. They are of a temporary nature. Had the recent agreement not been made, it is doubtful if the work in the Commission would have extended more than two years more. As it is, I would not be surprised if it took four or five years; three years at least.

Mr. BURTON. Who makes these appointments?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are made by the Secretary of the Interior, on the recommendation of the Dawes Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that if this point of order be sustained it leaves an appropriation of $400——

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, Mr. Chairman; the gentleman from Illinois has advised me that he will not press the point of order. He finds that the provision is not contained in the legislative bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly on this amendment. It seems to me there is a situation here that is worthy the attention of the committee. The Government has been expending enormous sums, to be counted by millions, for allotment of the lands and settling the rights of the respective Indians. These are among the finest lands in the world, not only for agricultural purposes, but also they have valuable mines of coal and asphalt and possibly other minerals. The total expense of the service for allotting, appraising, dividing, acting as mediator and judge in all the various classes of disputes among the Indians is paid by the United States. In view of the immense value of these lands divided among them for their benefit, the very large expenditures incurred prove that our country has been more than fair to these tribes.

I think, further, that the expenditures of this Commission are open to the accusation of extravagance. I find in the report of 1901, on page 784, a list of the employees. There appear in the first column on that page 19 surveyors and 57 appraisers. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that proportion of three to one is dangerously like that of three grown persons who have to escort one boy to the circus. [Laughter.] It would look to an outsider as if there were a surplus of appraisers.

On page 449 it will appear that there is 1 clerk in charge of one of the land offices, and there are some 32 subordinates. One clerk in charge, at $150 a month; 1 clerk, at $125 a month—I am reading from the Cherokee land office; 8 clerks, at $100 a month; one contest clerk, at $100 a month; 8 clerks, at $75 a month; 2 interpreters, at $60 per month; 5 stenographers, at $100 a month; 4 stenographers, at $75 a month; 1 marshal, at $60 per month; and 1 messenger, at $40 per month; and 2 janitors, at $30 a month; and office rent, etc. If any committee of this Congress, or Congress itself, should supply itself as lavishly with subordinates of these various classes it would be criticised very severely.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amount of the cut which I propose may be too great; and I desire to move to amend the amendment by inserting "one hundred and fifty thousand" instead of "ninety-three thousand." That will be substituting $150,000 in place of $200,815 provided in the bill. In the last bill it was $93,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, line 3, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "ninety-three thousand" and insert "one hundred and fifty thousand."

The question was considered, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to strike out "two hundred thousand" and insert "ninety-three thousand."

The question was considered, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operating and repairing the flour mill at Pima Agency, Arizona, $1,500.

Mr. BURTON. I move pro forma to strike out the last word; and pending that motion I should like to inquire whether this appropriation is a gratuity or in pursuance of treaty stipulation; and if a gratuity, why it should not be included under the head of "miscellaneous support and gratuities" in another portion of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a gratuity; and it is carried in this portion of the bill because all these provisions are gratuities; this portion of the bill embraces no appropriations in pursuance of treaty stipulations.

Mr. BURTON. Is there any reason why this should not be included with the items for the Pima Agency in a prior part of the bill, under the head of "Miscellaneous support and gratuities?" Why should this be given separately?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not answer the gentleman. I think that probably this was originally inserted in this part of the bill away back, long before my experience in Indian matters, and that the usage has been followed year after year. The question with us was not whether a particular appropriation should be on page 34 or page 23, but whether it should be reported at all.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman kindly yield for another question? Would it not be clearer and in better form if this item were included with those other gratuities?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would.

Mr. BURTON. Is the same true of the three following items? Are those gratuities?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; all of them.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to cause, under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," such Indian reservations as in his judgment are advantageous for agricultural and grazing purposes to be surveyed or resurveyed, for the purposes of said act, and to complete the allotment of the same, including the necessary clerical work incident thereto in the field and in the Office of Indian Affairs, and delivery of trust patents, so far as allotments shall have been selected under said act, $40,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 33, in lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "and in the Office of Indian Affairs."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of eliminating from this paragraph the provision for employees now provided for in the legislative bill, a matter to which my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] referred a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Then I understand that a part of this amount as reported was intended to cover the pay of employees now provided in the legislative appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; but the legislative bill was reported since this bill was reported, and having been provided for there the item should be stricken out here——

Mr. BURTON. What amount is covered by that part of this appropriation?

Mr. SHERMAN. About $10,000 or $12,000 or $15,000——

I offer no amendment reducing the appropriation here made because there is before the Appropriations Committee a communication from the Indian Office asking for a deficiency appropriation for the present fiscal year of, I think, $12,000 or $15,000—I am not positive which.

Mr. CANNON. That would not affect this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. It might somewhat. When a clause originally intended to cover the employment of clerks to the amount of $12,000 is struck out here because those clerks are already carried on the legislative bill, we might, it is true, reduce the aggregate appropriation in this paragraph. But I say I do not offer an amendment to that effect because there is a deficiency in this service for the present year of either $12,000 or $15,000.

Mr. CANNON. If so, that can be taken care of on an entirely different bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that; but because of the fact I have stated we propose to leave this amount at $40,000, notwithstanding there will be $12,000 less to be paid out next year by reason of the transfer of employees under the legislative bill. Nobody has offered any amendment to change the amount of this appropriation; I am simply explaining the reason why I offer no such amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Does not my friend think he had better reduce this amount? As I understand, by leaving this appropriation at the present sum there is a clean increase of $15,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. About that, I think.

Mr. CANNON. To be exact, $15,800.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a trifle more than the deficiency for the present year.

Mr. CANNON. Well, then, my friend assumes that this appropriation is to run permanently at $40,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily; but it probably will run for some years. Under section 2 of the act referred to in the paragraph—I have not the act before me at this moment—this sum is eventually reimbursable to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. From what?

Mr. SHERMAN. From the sale of lands.

Mr. CANNON. Well, my friend knows that such a provision might just as well be stricken out. The Government will never be reimbursed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I very much doubt it myself. I would not buy the claim for one hundred cents on the dollar.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will move to amend the paragraph by striking out at the close the words "forty thousand dollars" and inserting "twenty-four thousand two hundred dollars." Let us go through the correct form, anyhow. If $15,800 of the expenditure proposed by this paragraph as reported has been provided for in another place, let us make here a corresponding reduction; and if there is a deficiency, let us take care of that as such things are usually taken care of.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; if the gentleman is desirous of crowding additional work on the Appropriations Committee for his successor as chairman of that great committee, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "forty thousand dollars" and insert the words "twenty-four thousand two hundred dollars."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, if I may be heard briefly, it seems to me that amendment should prevail, because the legislative, executive, and judicial bill appropriates $15,800 for this very purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For survey and subdivision of Indian reservations and of lands to be allotted to Indians, and to make allotments in severalty, to be expended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $20,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14, page 34, after the word "dollars," insert:

"For survey of lands within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., and for examination in the field of survey, the sum of $17,000, to be immediately available; and for clerical work and stationery in the office of the surveyor-general, required on surveys within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., the sum of $3,200; in all, the sum of $20,200."

Mr. CANNON. Well, until my friend can explain, I will reserve the point of order upon that. It seems to me if that goes in at all it ought to go on the deficiency bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will state briefly that this provision has been in every Indian appropriation bill for the last four or five Congresses, to my knowledge, with the exception of one. It was omitted, as I remember, in the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress from the Indian appropriation bill and at that time went into the deficiency bill, in charge of the gentleman from Illinois, and he did not object to it. I will state briefly that it provides for completing or making the surveys in South Dakota, and from letters which I have from the Department it appears that this appropriation will complete those surveys. It has the approval of the Department, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior, in letters which I have here under date of January 3, and in order that I may have the correspondence pertaining to this subject in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that certain letters from the Department, which I will send to the desk, bearing upon this question, may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that he may print certain letters in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 5, 1900.

Hon. ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In response to your letter of the 5th instant, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, inclosing an estimate from the surveyor-general of South Dakota for the survey of the lands within the Pine Ridge and Standing Rock Indian reservations, and for the examination in the field of the surveys, to be immediately available, $22,000, and for clerical work, etc., in the office of the surveyor-general, required on surveys within the Cheyenne River, Pine Ridge, and Standing Rock Indian reservations, $3,200, I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a report dated February 15, 1900, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and of one of the 26th ultimo from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to whom the matter was referred.

These reports meet with my approval.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 15, 1900.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: This office is in receipt of a communication from Hon. ROBERT J. GAMBLE, dated February 5, 1900, in which he states he is in receipt of an item from Frank A. Morris, surveyor-general of South Dakota, asking that the same be made a part of the Indian appropriation bill in the House. The item appropriates $22,000 for the survey of lands in the Pine Ridge and Standing Rock Indian reservations in South Dakota, and the sum of $3,200 for clerical work and stationery in the office of the surveyor-general, required on surveys within the Cheyenne River, Pine Ridge, and Standing Rock reservations in South Dakota.

Mr. GAMBLE states that the bill having passed the House he can now only look to secure this legislation through the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate, and that he will be pleased to have the same considered and to receive the approval of this office. He also states that the people of his State are anxious to have all the Indian allotments made, and that he is informed the Indians are also anxious for the same.

It is understood in this office that most of the available lands in the Standing Rock Reservation, in South Dakota, have been surveyed. Some surveys have also been made in the Pine Ridge Reservation. While there is no immediate intention on the part of this office to make allotments to the Indians of Pine Ridge or Standing Rock reservations, it is thought desirable that all the lands in those reservations should be surveyed, if practicable, before the work is commenced, and it would be glad to have an appropriation made for the purpose. It is suggested, however, that Mr. GAMBLE'S letter be referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for any remarks thereon he may be pleased to make.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. A. JONES, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1900.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference from the Department, for report, of a letter from Hon. ROBERT J. GAMBLE, House of Representatives, dated February 5, 1900, inclosing an estimate received from Mr. Frank A. Morris, United States surveyor-general of South Dakota, for surveys within Indian reservations in that State, as follows:

For the survey of lands in the Pine Ridge and Standing Rock Indian reservations in South Dakota, and for examination in the field of the surveys, the sum of $22,000, to be immediately available.

"For clerical work and stationery in the office of surveyor general, required for surveys within the Cheyenne River, Pine Ridge, and Standing Rock Indian reservations, in South Dakota, the sum of $3,200."

There is also inclosed by the Department a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated February 15, 1900, relating to the subject of Mr. Gamble's letter, stating that—

"It is understood in this office that most of the available lands in the Standing Rock Reservation in South Dakota have been surveyed. Some surveys have also been made in the Pine Ridge Reservation. While there is no immediate intention on the part of this office to make allotments to the Indians of Pine Ridge or Standing Rock reservations, it is thought desirable that all the lands in those reservations should be surveyed, if practicable, before the work is commenced, and it would be glad to have an appropriation made for the purpose. It is suggested, however, that Mr. GAMBLE'S letter be referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for any remarks thereon he may be pleased to make."

In response to the direction of the Department to report in the matter of the proposed appropriation, I have to state—

First. A large proportion—considerably more than one-half—of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation is unsurveyed.

Second. About one-half of that part of the Standing Rock Indian Reservation in South Dakota is surveyed, or under contract for survey.

Third. The survey of the entire Cheyenne River Indian Reservation has been contracted for and a very considerable portion of the surveys have been returned and accepted.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs in letter above mentioned, states that while there is no immediate intention on the part of his office to make allotments to the Indians of Pine Ridge or Standing Rock reservations, he thinks it desirable that all the lands in those reservations should be surveyed, if practicable, before the work of allotment is commenced, and that he would be glad to have an appropriation made for the purpose.

In view of this statement by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I can perceive no objection to the proposed appropriation for surveys of Indian reservations in South Dakota and examination of such surveys in the field.

Mr. GAMBLE, referring to the Indian appropriation bill passed by the House February 3, 1900, states that he does not believe the appropriation which this bill carries is sufficient for the surveys desired.

Upon examination of said Indian bill, I find that the same carries no specific appropriation for Indian surveys in South Dakota, but provides (p. 40, lines 17-20) for survey and subdivision of Indian reservations, $20,000. This appropriation would, in the absence of a specific appropriation, be applicable to the necessary Indian surveys in South Dakota.

Regarding the sufficiency of the appropriation, I would state that it seems to be the opinion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that all the lands in the Pine Ridge and Standing Rock reservations, South Dakota, should be surveyed before the work of allotment is commenced. Should this course be deemed necessary, a much larger appropriation than that carried by the Indian bill or that estimated by the surveyor-general would be necessary.

It is roughly estimated that the lands remaining unsurveyed in the Pine Ridge Reservation aggregate 90 full townships, and in the Standing Rock Reservation (in South Dakota) 40 full townships, making in all 130 full townships. At an average estimated cost of $400 per township, the total amount required for field work (lands to be surveyed as public lands are surveyed) would, therefore, be about $52,000, to which should be added 10 per cent for field examinations, making in all $57,200. This estimate is made at minimum rates per mile; possibly a portion of the lands would require higher rates for survey.

As to the estimate submitted by the surveyor-general for clerical work and stationery required upon Indian surveys to be made under the surveying estimate of appropriation submitted by him, I would state that the surveyor-general is a most efficient and painstaking officer, and I have no doubt said estimate received his careful consideration. In case, however, a larger sum be appropriated for surveys than that estimated by the surveyor-general, there should be a corresponding increase in the appropriation for office work and stationery.

The papers referred are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 27, 1903.

Hon. CHAS. H. BURKE,
Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of Department letter of the 3d instant, addressed to the chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate, relative to an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. GAMBLE, providing for an appropriation of $20,200 for surveys within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., and copy of Indian Office report in the matter, dated December 27, 1902.

Very respectfully,

THOS. RYAN,
Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 3, 1903.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by your reference of the 18th ultimo, of an amendment to H. R. 15804, intended to be proposed by Mr

GAMBLE, providing for an appropriation of $20,200 for surveys of lands within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., and examination thereof and clerical work and stationery in the office of the surveyor-general.

In response thereto, I transmit herewith a copy of a report of the 27th ultimo from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recommending that the amendment receive favorable consideration.

The views of the Commissioner meet with my approval.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 27, 1902.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: This office is in receipt, by Department reference, for early report of an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. GAMBLE to the bill (H. R. 15804) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, referred to the Department December 18, 1902, by Hon. W. M. STEWART, chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, with a request for a report thereon for the information of said committee.

The amendment appropriates for survey of lands within the Pine Ridge Reservation, S. Dak., and for examination in the field of surveys, the sum of $17,000, to be immediately available, and for clerical work and stationery in the office of the surveyor general, required on surveys within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., the sum of $3,200; in all, the sum of $20,200.

It is understood that nearly all the lands in the Pine Ridge Reservation have been surveyed and that this appropriation is intended to complete the work.

This office is of the opinion that this ought to be done, and recommends that the amendment be returned with favorable report.

Very respectfully,

W. A. JONES, Commissioner.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, of course I have no objection to the printing of those letters, because that gives the information. As I understand it, first, this money is to be immediately available; second, it is really an appropriation for the survey of public lands that have been surveyed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The lands are being surveyed now; the survey is under process.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it is under the General Land Office. They are surveyed as other public lands are surveyed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be passed without prejudice for the moment, and I think I can convince the gentleman from Illinois that the point of order ought not to be insisted upon.

Mr. CANNON. I am not antagonizing the items at all, because I have not full information about it, but it has no place on this bill. It seems to me its natural place, if necessary, is on the deficiency bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It has never been anywhere else than on this bill, except in one Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Well, there are a good many things that get scattered about in bills that ought not to be there. I am willing it should pass for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by him may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of the commissioner authorized by the Indian appropriation act approved June 7, 1897, to superintend the sale of land, etc., of the Puyallup Indian Reservation, Wash., who shall continue the work as therein provided, $2,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that provision. I shall not insist on the motion if there is an explanation of the reason for continuing this salary. Also, I should like to know how long this agent has been employed there looking after those sales, how much land and of what value remains to be disposed of, and what reason exists why the agents provided for on pages 30 and 31 of the bill can not do this work. On those pages $17,000 is appropriated for general incidental expenses of the Indian surveys in Washington, including traveling expenses of the agents, etc., and pay for employees.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Puyallup Commission was created by act of 1892, I think it was, and it originally provided for a commission of three persons, who were to oversee the sale of these lands. Some five years ago the act was amended, reducing the commission to one man, and that one man has acted ever since. On page 67 of the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are found these words, explaining this item:

The Indian appropriation act approved May 27, 1902, contains the following clause, which provides for continuing the sale of Puyallup lands during the present fiscal year:

"For compensation of the commissioner authorized by the Indian appropriation act approved June 7, 1897, to superintend the sale of land, etc., of the Puyallup Indian Reservation, Wash., who shall continue the work as therein provided, $2,000."

This work was continued during the last fiscal year under a similar provision contained in the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1901. Clinton A. Snowden, who was appointed Puyallup commissioner June 22, 1897, is still in charge of the work.

As stated in the last annual report, Commissioner Snowden was of the opinion that the appraised value of the lots within the Indian addition to the city of Tacoma was too low, and he recommended that they be reexamined with a view to their reappraisement, and that meantime sales of the lots be suspended. Accordingly, this office telegraphed him, July 19, 1901, to suspend the sales until further orders, and August 13, 1901, he was instructed as to reappraisement.

The reappraisement has been completed by Commissioner Snowden, and sales will soon be resumed. The lots within the Indian addition to the city of Tacoma aggregate 3,600, and there are 10 tracts considered as lots and blocks, making in all 3,610. There have been sold 1,945 lots and tracts considered as lots, leaving 1,655 yet for sale.

I can not state the exact value of the property. I think the provision should remain in the bill.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a further question. What is the value of the land remaining to be sold, and to whom do the proceeds go?

Mr. SHERMAN. The proceeds go to the Puyallup Indians, after deducting the expenses of the Commission and the expenses of the survey. The fund is charged with these expenses.

Mr. BURTON. This is reimbursable, then?

Mr. SHERMAN. This is reimbursable out of the fund arising from the sale of the land.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest that these lands are near the city of Tacoma and are quite valuable. Therefore they need some one to look after them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I judge so, and I judge from the report that I have just read that a considerable sum of money has been saved to the Indians by reason of the reappraisal.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to strike out the paragraph which follows, as provision is made in the legislative bill for this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the work of transferring the Indian depredation claims from the Office of Indian Affairs to the Court of Claims and making a record of the same, and for the proper care and custody of the papers and records relating thereto, under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L., p. 851), $4,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I offer my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, on page 34, and lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 35.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I should like to ask the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. These employees are now provided for in the legislative bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Carried in another bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Carried in another bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And this appropriation is no longer necessary?

Mr. SHERMAN. No longer necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to do the necessary surveying and otherwise carry out the purposes of so much of the act of May 27, 1902, making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the fiscal year 1903, and for other purposes, as provides for the allotment of the Indians of the Walker River Reservation in Nevada, and the Uintah and White River Utes in Utah, and the joint resolution of June 19, 1902, providing for the allotment of the Indians of Spokane Reservation in Washington, to be immediately available, $175,000.

For the resurvey and marking of the southern and western boundaries of the Uintah Indian Reservation from the initial point on Green River to the intersection of said boundary line with the range line between ranges 6 and 7 east, of Sac and Lake Meridian, Utah, an estimated distance of 135 miles, at $40 per mile, and for the field examination of said resurvey, $6,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out these two paragraphs. I should like to inquire, in the first place, whether this is reimbursable, and, in the next place, what is the reason for the very large amount here for the allotment of the lands of the Indians of the Walker River Reservation? Also, there is a third inquiry which naturally presents itself: Why should this provision for the Indians of the Walker River Reservation in Nevada, and the Uintah and White River Utes in Utah, and that for the Indians of the Spokane Reservation in Washington be combined in one omnibus provision? Are there separate estimates for the three? If so, why should they be combined?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is one estimate, and the estimate is set out in full in the regular report accompanying the appropriation bill, which I presume the gentleman has before him. If he desires, I will have it read from the desk. It is set out in the report.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to have it read if it is brief. How long is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. About one printed page.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to have the Clerk read it, so that it will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the meantime, let me say the three provisions are covered in one item because in the act of last year which made this survey necessary they were all covered in one item.

Mr. BURTON. Before the reading begins, are these amounts reimbursable?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not reimbursable. I ask the Clerk to read the letter of the Secretary.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 3, 1902.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, calling attention to an item of $157,000 in the estimate of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, for the surveying, etc., on the Walker River Reservation in Nevada, and the Uintah and White River Utes in Utah, and $6,000 for the resurvey and marking of the southern and western boundaries in the Uintah Reservation, etc., and in reply to your request to be informed of the "necessity for these appropriations, what is desired to be accomplished by them, and whether or not anything has been done to carry out the law with reference to the Uintah Reservation passed last year," beg to state, as to the last inquiry, that the $70,064.48 provided by the act of May 27, 1902, to be paid to the Utes, has been so paid, in accordance with the terms of public resolution No. 31, approved June 19, 1902.

On June 6, 1902, estimate for surveying the Walker River, Uintah, and Spokane reservations, and for allotments to the Indians thereon, was hastily made because of the approaching adjournment of Congress, and forwarded to that body through the Senate and House Committees on Indian Affairs, no provisions for these purposes having been made in the act of May 27, 1902, aforesaid, which required allotments to be made to the Indians of those reservations; but no action thereon seems to have been taken beyond a provision in the deficiency act approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat., 575), which requires the Secretary of the Interior "to cause careful estimates to be made and submitted to Congress at the beginning of its next session for survey of the Walker River Reservation in Nevada, the Uintah Reservation in Utah, and the Spokane Reservation in Washington."

The estimates for these surveys have been prepared and will be immediately forwarded to Congress, the amounts thereof being severally as follows:

Walker River	$11,118.75
Uintah	108,756.00
Spokane	17,000.00
Total for surveys	136,874.75

To this sum is to be added the amounts required for allotments on the said reservations, as per Department letter of June 6, 1902, viz:

Walker River	$4,000.00
Uintah	12,000.00
Spokane	2,000.00
Total for allotments	18,000.00

making in all, $154,874.75.

The necessity for this appropriation lies in the fact that the law can not be fully executed without the means to survey the reservation and to make allotments to the Indians thereof, as provided by the aforesaid act of May 27, 1902.

If it is still the wish of Congress that this shall be done, the sum of money above named will necessarily be required to carry the same into effect.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section just read by the Clerk. I do not know whether the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio included that or not. Did I understand that it did?

Mr. BURTON. I did not hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Did your motion to strike out include both sections?

Mr. BURTON. From line 4 down to and including line 23.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The motion was withdrawn. I desire to move to strike out the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out from lines 16 to 23, both inclusive, on page 35.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, at the last session of Congress we provided for opening the Uintah Indian Reservation. This bill makes an appropriation of a large part of the $175,000 mentioned in the preceding paragraph for this purpose. This is appropriated for making surveys for allotments and such other surveys as may be necessary to carry that act into operation. If the Uintah Reservation is opened, which I believe it will be, this appropriation of $6,000 for reestablishing the boundary lines of the reservation is entirely useless. The boundary lines have been in their present condition for many years, and if by any mischance the reservation should not be opened it will not hurt to let it wait for another year; and if the reservation is opened it is simply an appropriation of $6,000 without any useful purpose whatever. I think it should be stricken from this bill.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Whether the reservation is opened or not, is it not necessary to define these boundaries? The adjoining land is private land to-day, and the boundary line becomes a matter of importance; so that if this reservation is finally opened these surveys will not be lost. That much surveying will already have been done, and it will not have to be done again. It will be a starting point for the final survey in the opening of the entire reservation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The reservation will be simply restored to the public domain. Of course it can not interfere with the private lands. The allotments that are made to the Indians are made in a part of the reservation entirely away from this line. It seems to me that if the reservation should be opened that that survey would be entirely useless.

Mr. SHERMAN. The fact is that these Indians have claimed for several years that a fraud was perpetrated upon them when this line was laid out. They have alleged that the line was not in fact laid out at all; that the surveyors sent there for that purpose devoted their energies to amusements that suited them while occupying their tents for a while, and that, as a matter of fact, they never ran out the line; and that the white people of Utah have since claimed the line was wherever they chose, and have maintained it, and because of that fact white persons have encroached very materially upon their reservations.

Now, I do not pretend to say whether or no the contention be true, but I do maintain that we can not afford in our dealings with the Indians, for the sake of saving $4,000 or $5,000, the expense of a survey, to permit them to go on indefinitely with the idea that we quietly sit by as a government and permit the white people to perpetrate a wrong upon them by reason of neglect of duty by the officials we sent there. I think the amendment ought not to prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, referring to the amendment which I offered a few moments ago, the gentleman from Illinois, I understand, withdraws his point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I do not make any point of order upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee will recur to the point in the bill to which the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14, page 34, insert at the end of the line the following:

"For survey of lands within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., and for examination in the field of surveys, the sum of $17,000, to be immediately available, and for clerical work and stationery in the office of the surveyor-general, required on surveys within the Pine Ridge Agency, S. Dak., the sum of $3,200; in all, the sum of $22,200."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To maintain at the city of St. Louis, Mo., in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, a warehouse for the receipt, storage, and shipping of goods for the Indian Service, $10,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph, from lines 3 to 6, inclusive. I should like to inquire if it is not true that only a very small amount of supplies were shipped from this warehouse during the last year. I should like also to inquire how many of these warehouses there are, and what is the advantage of having one at St. Louis. I desire to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, Mr. Chairman, the St. Louis warehouse was established only by last year's bill. The amount of goods shipped from it was not large. It has been small during the year. I was not in favor of establishing this warehouse. It was established by Senate amendment. I believe that with two warehouses, one at Chicago and one at New York, we can have better service than with four or six or with any larger number. Economy is practiced and the service improved. I dislike to oppose the amendment, and I do not care to accept it. I do believe that the benefit to the service, if any, is not commensurate with the size of the appropriation.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. What is the character of the purchases made and the stores kept in these warehouses?

Mr. SHERMAN. All sorts of stores.

Mr. COWHERD. Are not the supplies largely food, meat, flour, and do not they constitute the largest item?

Mr. SHERMAN. Provisions and clothing constitute the largest item.

Mr. COWHERD. I am asking that question along the line of the gentleman's suggestion that Chicago and New York alone should be maintained as storage places. It seems to me that St. Louis is much nearer a larger per cent of the Indian tribes that receive the supplies.

Mr. SHERMAN. The department has not found it advantageous, at least so far, to use St. Louis to any great extent. They do ship from San Francisco, where no permanent storehouse is provided. They ship largely from Chicago, and they do ship to a certain extent from Omaha, I think to a considerably greater amount than from St. Louis. But the greatest shipments are from New York and Chicago. There the bids are received and there the freight rates are made.

Mr. COWHERD. I will admit that if the gentleman would change the warehouse from St. Louis to Kansas City it would be much better for this kind of supplies.

Mr. SHERMAN. Quite likely that is so.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the Indian warehouse in St. Louis was established only four months ago. There was great difficulty in finding a suitable place, and then, after it had been found, there was great difficulty in getting the appropriation. So that it would not be entirely fair to compare St. Louis warehouse with any warehouse that has been in existence a long time. I have been told in the Interior Department that a large number of goods can be bought much cheaper in St. Louis markets than in any other markets in the country. The Indian Commissioner has deemed it of very great advantage to the department and in the interests of economy to establish that warehouse, and I sincerely trust the gentleman from Ohio will not press the amendment. Give them a chance to exist for a year, and then, if the experiment does not prove successful, I myself will be ready and willing to consent to its abolition.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee, I want to move an amendment to the amendment by striking out "St. Louis" and inserting "Kansas City."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the amendment striking out the provision should be adopted. It is a question in which we can not take into account local considerations. There are two objections. In the first place, there is no possible use for four storehouses for Indian supplies at an expense of $10,000 each. Two would be amply sufficient. Then there is another objection; every time you have an additional storehouse you stimulate the demand for rations, annuities, etc., and enhance the cost of the Indian service.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, while I stated, in answer to to the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, that Kansas City might be a better point of distribution than St. Louis, I question whether the service is improved at all by the warehouses in either place. It seems to me that we are not injuring the bill, and we are certainly assisting the administrative department, by omitting the provision for a warehouse at either point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], substituting Kansas City for St. Louis.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] striking out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTHOLDT) there were 29 ayes and 17 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the equipment and maintenance of the asylum for insane Indians at Canton, S. Dak., for incidental and all other expenses necessary for its proper conduct and management, including pay of employees, and for necessary expense of transporting insane Indians to and from said asylum, $25,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

I would like to ask if the Indian Commissioner or the Secretary of the Interior has recommended the foundation of an insane asylum for the Indians; also how many Indians there are whose friends are seeking for their admission into such an institution? How many occupants are there for this asylum?

Mr. SHERMAN. The asylum was created by an item inserted in the bill in the Senate a few years ago, without any prior—and if I remember correctly—or subsequent recommendation, either from the Bureau or from the Department. If my memory serves me correctly, the conferees of the House zealously opposed the item, and it was only at the close of a protracted session that we finally receded from our position. The asylum was therefore created, not in accord with the recommendation of the Bureau or the Department, but in the way I have described. This answers the question of the gentleman. The institution has been completed only recently—within the last six months.

There are less than 15 insane persons now there. The number of Indian insane throughout the United States I can not now state. It is not as large as one would suppose. My recollection is that the percentage of Indian insane is lower than the percentage of white insane throughout the country. The insane Indians have heretofore been cared for, some in the insane hospital in this District, and others in the States, or in private hospitals in one part of the country or another. It has not always been easy to obtain their admission into hospitals or asylums. They are not desirable patients. But they have been cared for, those that were violently insane, in such hospitals heretofore at an expense to the Government very much less than this appropriation.

The creation of this asylum, when it was originally determined upon, was against my judgment and against the judgment of the conferees of the House on the Indian appropriation bill. And I believe there never since has been a time when a majority of the Indian Committee of the House did not think the project unwise. But here we are, up against this question. The asylum is there; the employees are there. What are we to do—continue the institution and take care of the Indian insane, or abandon it?

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURTON, there were, on a division (called for by Mr. BURTON)—ayes 11, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any part of the $100,000 for the removal and support of the Mission Indians in California, appropriated by the act of May 27, 1902, making appropriations for the Indian service for the fiscal year 1903, not needed for the purposes specified in that act, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be used for the purchase of other tracts of land in California upon which to locate said Mission Indians.

Mr. BURTON. On this paragraph I reserve a point of order; and pending the point, I wish to inquire whether this does not involve the purchase of land or the performance of other acts, outside of the intention of the original statute.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. This is a long story—the story of the removal of the Mission Indians; but I will be as brief as I can.

These Indians had lived one hundred years or more on lands in California which they believed were their own. The Supreme Court, within a couple of years, has affirmed a decision that they were not rightfully upon the land, and the owner began ejectment proceedings. The Indians appealed to the Government to come to their rescue and to secure title to the lands. An attempt was made to purchase the so-called Warner ranch; but it was found that the person or persons in whom, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, the title was vested would not accept a reasonable valuation for the land.

Last year Congress appropriated $100,000 to purchase a site for a new home for these Indians, to remove them to that new home, and to give them something of a start in the way of cattle, agricultural implements, seed, etc. It did not require all of the appropriation to purchase the site first chosen. But afterwards it was found advisable to add to that site by the purchase of some property either adjoining or adjacent. But the Auditor of the Treasury Department held that under the wording of the statute, one piece of property having been purchased, no more of the appropriation could be used for purchasing additions to that site. It is to correct that condition that this item is here.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Assuming that the newly-purchased portion is not adjacent to that already purchased, will that fact involve the employment of two Indian agents and two separate set of employees?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no, no. This involves the employment of no additional agent or employees under an agent.

Mr. BURTON. About what is the number of this tribe? Is it a small or a large one?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not very large.

Mr. BURTON. Two hundred?

Mr. SHERMAN. The number is in the hundreds; I do not recollect the exact number. It is less than 2,000.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman state what amount of the old appropriation remains unexpended?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think somewhere from $50,000 to $60,000 was the purchase price of the land; and it was estimated that it would require about $30,000 of the fund to remove the Indians and their belongings and to render them necessary assistance until self-supporting upon their new field.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert, after line 9, page 37, the following:

"For the purpose of compromising, settling, and finally disposing of the case of The United States v. William H. Thomas and others, which suit was begun in equity and has been prosecuted in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of North Carolina for the benefit of the Eastern Band of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, the sum of $4,000, to be paid to said band of Indians by and under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States whenever, in his judgment, such payment will operate to secure a complete settlement of all matters pertaining to such litigation."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that, and would like to hear the explanation of the gentleman. I think I know what this is, but I am not positive.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the committee that this is an item for the purpose of compromising a suit which has been pending in the Federal courts of western North Carolina, I think, for more than twenty-five years. The matter in controversy really lies in the district represented by my colleague, Mr. MOODY, who, I regret very much to say, is sick at this time and confined to his room at his hotel in this city. Otherwise he would be making this motion to-day instead of myself. This item is recommended, in fact that amendment was drafted, by the Department of Justice and transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, together with a letter that advises the insertion of this particular item. This letter says that this litigation has been long pending, has been very extensive, and is now about completed, and "I believe can be terminated if this amount be appropriated." I have merely a copy of that letter, but I understand it is signed by the Attorney-General.

As I understand the case, not being familiar with all the details, it is a matter that the Department of Justice has had under consideration for a long time and is anxious to have closed. I will state further that a bill with a similar purpose in view has passed the Senate during this session of Congress, but the wording of this Senate bill is not entirely satisfactory to the Department. The Department prefers this item and the wording of it, because, as I understand it, it leaves the payment of this money to the Attorney-General whenever in his judgment the matters pertaining to that suit are compromised and settled. I hope that with this statement the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPPORT OF SCHOOLS.

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, $1,240,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "two hundred and forty thousand." I desire to be heard at some length upon this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio indicates that he desires to be heard at some length, and I think if he will intimate how long he would like to be heard I will ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for that length of time, so that he may not be interrupted every five minutes.

Mr. BURTON. I do not desire more than ten minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, this brings us to the important question of the school system maintained by the Government among the Indians. It is upon this object that there has been the greatest increase of expense. In recent years the total amount paid for annuities has not greatly increased and that for gratuities has not increased. If the annual payments for interest on trust funds have become greater, it is because the proceeds of Indian lands have been deposited in the Treasury. The increase in appropriations for schools, however, has been very great. In 1877 the amount was $20,000. In 1881 it was $75,000; in 1886, $1,100,000; in 1891, $1,842,000; in 1901, $3,080,000. The aggregate expense from 1882 to 1891 was about ten millions. From 1892 to 1901 it was, approximately, twenty-five millions.

Now, the people of this country would not begrudge these amounts if they were helpful, but I verily believe the system is to the detriment rather than to the benefit of the Indians as now carried on. I want to read a few figures which I will publish in full in connection with some remarks made on Monday, to show the effect of these schools upon several Indian tribes. I will select, first, the Shoshones and Northern Arapahoes, at the Shoshone Agency, Wyo. The number slightly diminished from 1891 to 1901. The number who could read increased. The number attending school increased. The expense of maintaining the school there in 1891 was $17,366; in 1901, $23,042.

Now, let us see what was the effect on their habits of industry. In 1891 the percentage subsisting by labor in civilized pursuits was 25 per cent, or one-quarter; the percentage subsisting by hunting, 25 per cent; by Government rations and annuities, 50 per cent.

After ten years of schooling—and this school was established in 1879—let us see what was the result. Instead of 25 per cent subsisting by civilized labor, there were only 12 per cent; instead of 50 per cent subsisting by Government rations and annuities, there were 88 per cent.

The agency at Umatilla, Oreg., furnishes a similar showing. In 1891 there were 997 in this tribe. In 1901 there were 1,083. The number wearing citizens' dress had increased. The number who could read had increased somewhat, but as regards labor the showing was not so favorable. In 1891, 50 per cent were subsisting by labor in civilized pursuits, 25 per cent by hunting and fishing, 25 per cent by Government rations. In 1901, instead of 50 per cent subsisting by civilized pursuits there were only 30 per cent, while those supported by Government rations increased from 25 per cent to 50 per cent. A similar showing is made at the Sisseton Agency, S. Dak., and at the Nez Perce Agency in Idaho, and at other agencies. This shows that there is a vital defect in the system of education adopted by the Indian Department.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. He says, taking these figures, showing that with the increase in education or facilities for education increasing laziness goes hand in hand, therefore the laziness is caused by the education. Would it not be just as fair to take the increase in the number of inmates in the workhouses in Ohio and show that crime goes hand in hand with the increase in education, and therefore that it should be attributed to the education of the people in Ohio? Or would it not be just as fair to show the growth of the churches there, and to show that while the churches are growing yet there are more people going to the penitentiary, and therefore the churches are responsible for the increase in crime?

Mr. BURTON. I will suggest to the gentleman that my time is very limited.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman can have all the time that is necessary, if the schools are to be charged with all the crime and pauperism among the Indians.

Mr. BURTON. The vital defect in the gentleman's logic is to compare the criminal classes that are in workhouses with the Indian schools, which are supposed to be representative of the best rather than the worst. I do not care to make any further answer than that. Now, what are these defects? Why, that they overlook the primary necessity of teaching them habits of industry.

In my remarks on Monday I quoted from the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in which he speaks of the injurious tendency of removing them from their homes, from the teepee and the hut, and taking them to a school where there are electric lights and the finest of modern conveniences, and endeavoring to transform their very lives. I want to read briefly on this subject from a letter of Col. R. H. Pratt, the superintendent of Carlisle. While I do not agree with him that the nonreservation schools are better than the reservation schools, he has this to say about the latter class:

In closing this report I desire to emphasize statements I have been making for several years past. I have now been in the Indian-school service twenty-three years, not counting the three years' feeble school work for and while in charge of Indian prisoners at Fort Marion, St. Augustine, Fla. My experience among the Indians prior to going to Florida, added to the Florida experience, led me to know that all the Indians need in order to become English-speaking, useful, intelligent American citizens is the same opportunities and responsibilities accorded to our people and all foreigners who emigrate to and locate among us. I have always seen, and now more than ever before see, that it is impossible to give the Indians these opportunities with any force in their tribal aggregations on their reservations.

The element of necessity of contact, the learning by seeing, association with, and doing is entirely absent at their homes. We had ample experiences to prove this before Carlisle and other nonreservation schools were established. No experiences we have had since disprove it. Educating them together in tribes is only added hire to remain tribes. Tribal disintegration, individual freedom, and the taking upon their individual selves the useful qualities of our American life can never come to them in any fullness through any educational training that may be given to them in their tribal masses on their reservations, no difference how excellent the quality of instruction. Again I say the Sioux, educated in schools made up entirely of Sioux on the Sioux Reservation, naturally accept that they are to remain Sioux indefinately.

There being a general slush fund for that purpose in the hands of the Department, and all agents and agency school people naturally willing to build and improve their surroundings at the public expense, in many cases expensive school buildings have been erected on the reservations for practically all the children. These schools are required to be kept full or their employee force is cut down. This compels the reservation school, through its entire employee force, to hold the children to their reservations. Most of the nonreservation schools are carried on as though under the reservation system, because no effort is made to give their pupils experiences and opportunities beyond the school limits. The children are brought from the reservations to the schools, reservated there for a time, and then returned to the reservations.

As I have no sympathy with any methods of tribalizing or catering to useless Indians, not even with schools, when used for that purpose, I feel that I am becoming more and more extraneous to about all that is being done for the Indians, because I see that much failure is bound to come in the final reckoning, for it will continue to be alleged and alleged to be proven that Indians can not take on our education and civilization successfully; but in truth they have never been really invited into nor allowed any real opportunity to enter civilization's family.

Very respectfully,

R. H. PRATT,
Lieutenant-Colonel Fifteenth Cavalry, Superintendent.

A few days ago I quoted from the course of study of six years in agriculture, the inevitable result of which would be to break down habits of self-reliance rather than to build them up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the gentleman desire any more time?

Mr. BURTON. I have asked the indulgence of the committee long enough, and I do not ask for any further time. I simply ask to have printed with my remarks an editorial in the Washington Post of this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman desires, I will ask that his time be extended five minutes.

Mr. BURTON. I will not ask that, but will ask instead to have leave to print with my remarks an editorial from the Washington Post, published this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print a certain editorial with his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

INDIAN EDUCATION.

Congress is now in the midst of its annual wrestle with the Indian appropriations, and the same crude notions about the education of the aborigines seem to be manifesting themselves as of old. The Government appears to be resolved to go on, year after year and generation after generation, spending money on fine schools for teaching the Indian children fine things, but paying scant attention to the humbler but more solid acquirements.

Everyone acquainted with Indian affairs knows that a great deal of the so-called "education" of the race is a humbug. An Indian child is coaxed away from its home by one form of persuasion or another, and entered at a school a long distance off. No people are more jealous of the comfort of their progeny than the red people of the West, and unless the children send home glowing accounts of their life and doings at school the parents insist on bringing them back again. Hence as the color of a child's skin makes little difference in his love of luxury and his craving for a good time, the school authorities coddle their Indian charges beyond the last extreme ever practiced in the case of the children of white farmers and laborers, with whose general wordly condition the Indian's most nearly corresponds. When the superintendent of an Indian school is questioned about this policy, his usual answer is that the first great desideratum is to get the Indians to consent to their children's coming to school at all, and that it is wise to make any reasonable concession to keep the youngsters contented, so as to maintain a hold upon them.

Hence when we see the children from tepees and rough cabins herded together in schools kept clean by hired janitors and supplied with all the modern conveniences, living daily on food which is cooked for them by servants in huge ovens and cauldrons, wearing clothing which is washed and ironed in a big laundry with running water, automatic boilers, stationary tubs, and steam and electric appliances galore, we are expected to admire the generosity of a great and good government. It does not suggest itself to the ordinary mind to inquire to what all this tends. But we may as well be frank when we do pause to ask the question.

Take a little white girl out of a dingy tenement, with no surroundings through her earlier life save those of poverty, and no tradition inherited from her ancestors except a struggle for the necessaries of existence; put her into a "select school for young ladies" for two or three years, teach her reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, algebra, history, and what not, and then—turn her loose? No; send her back to the tenement. What becomes of her? Even suppose, for the sake of keeping up the forms of a practical training, she has been allowed to do some of the superficial work of the school—a little sewing, an occasional table setting, a turn at the machinery in the laundry. How much does all this help her in her future as a tenement dweller? She despises her environment. If she is married, it is either to a man whom she has learned to look upon as a clod or to one who, like herself, has been "educated" out of his sphere and who finds himself a stranger when he goes back to it. Her position is perilous in the extreme. One girl in a hundred has character enough to stand such a strain; the other ninety and nine are likely to succumb.

On the other hand, take the same tenement child and teach her how to wash at a common tub, press with a flatiron heated on a cook stove, cook well with the appliances of a poor man's kitchen, and you can afford to let the elegances go till the next generation comes along. You have started a new home and a family on a sound basis, and that is enough for the present.

Yet we expect more character in the aboriginal children than in our own. We fondly fancy, without stopping to think of the absurdity of it, that human nature is absolutely different under a red skin and under a white.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is very much at fault in the selection of the particular line of Indian education that he will first assail. He moves to strike out from the appropriation for the local schools about one-fifth—a little over one-fifth—of the entire sum. Now, it seems to me that what ought to be done is to increase constantly the facilities for the education of the Indian at home. When the Indian boy or girl is in the day school in the locality in which he lives, going home at night, the whole family gets the benefit of the teaching. The boys and girls study at night, and their parents are benefited with the children. So I think that this particular feature of the Indian educational system is the one that ought to be encouraged.

Yet the gentleman strikes at that special feature, and undertakes to cut down the allowance for that branch of Indian education. It certainly does not follow that because there has been some increase in lack of industry in any tribe that the school system ought to be blamed for it. It does not follow by any manner of means that because in connection with education certain crimes increase or certain lack of industry is shown, that therefore it is the result of education. It is true that education is not the "cure-all," but it is essential.

Colonel Pratt, of the Carlisle school, has struck the keynote of the Indian question when he says we should carry education to the children, and that the attempt to keep the Indians separate from the white race should be abandoned. His theory is that the Indians educated at the Carlisle school should never be sent back to the reservation, but should remain as a permanent part of the civilized population of the country. There are only about 250,000 of them. They can readily be absorbed in the entire population of the United States, and the effort to keep them as a separate organization is a mistake. We do not attempt to do that with any other portion of our fellow-citizens. We have immigrants from many foreign countries.

We do not try to keep them separate and distinct. They mingle with our people, and the mingling of Indian blood has not been to the injury of the white race. We have found in localities where the Indian has gradually become absorbed in the great mass of the white people that the descendants of these Indians are of the highest order of intelligence. They have many of the good qualities of both races. To promote the breaking up of the tribal relation education is the first essential step. Education should not be furnished solely at nonreservation schools, nor at boarding schools, but that education which is brought home to the children in the tepee, in the house, in the home of their parents, is of the most useful character.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If this amendment carries, will it destroy the reservation schools?

Mr. LACEY. The proposition is to reduce the money to furnish the local schools, the reservation schools, and the day schools. It would cripple these schools greatly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be much better to do away with the schools outside of the reservations?

Mr. LACEY. If there is to be a reduction anywhere I should say that it should be of the nonreservation schools. I would not favor any marked reduction there, nor favor an increase; but the gentleman is striking at the wrong place. The trouble in many localities in regard to education is taking the children away from home for their education. The best school system is that where the child takes his dinner to school, goes a few miles from his home, and returns home at night. Then during the holidays he can work upon the farm or the ordinary avocations of the family. That is the best school system and one about which there ought to be no niggardly economy. To strike at this particular feature of the Indian school system is an assault upon the most useful branch of the Indian school system.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I had not thought of addressing the House on this question, but my conviction is so strong that the item sought to be stricken out by this motion is the best part of the bill that I will say a word or two. I believe that the nonreservation school has reached the high-water mark. Really I think it has gone further than it should have gone. I believe the best possible theory is to increase the day and industrial schools upon the reservations.

The trouble with the nonreservation schools is, as a general proposition, that you take the boy and educate him, and if he becomes an American citizen and lives with the whites and does not go back to the reservation, while you have benefited him a new crop is constantly coming on to be disposed of in the same way, and thus there can be no ending of the expenses. It ought to be the leading policy of the Indian schools to place them as near as possible at the door of the Indian, as was well said by my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. When the school is there it is near the home. The home becomes a part of the school.

I have never heard it advocated before that in that class of schools we should take any backward step. I believe if one-half of the money spent on the nonreservation schools was expended in the little schoolhouses upon the reservation, with practical teachers—practical farmers—every little schoolhouse could be the school where the rudiments of an education would be taught and that it would be an example for the parents to follow, and they would become lovers and advocates of the schools themselves.

I do believe that taking the children away from the reservation often antagonizes the parent Indian, and he becomes discontented because his children are gone for years and years and he never sees them. Therefore I shall myself very earnestly oppose the amendment as applied to these schools. Not only the Government schools, but the missionary schools upon the reservations, are doing a great work. The two are the great forces that must elevate the tribal Indian, that we must look to to lead the semicivilized to citizenship and to manhood. They reach the evil at its roots and seek to exterminate it.

I hope the amendment of my distinguished friend from Ohio will not be sustained. I want, however, to say to him that later when it becomes necessary to reduce the nonreservation school and in this way bring about more economy for the administration of these affairs, the gentleman from Ohio or any other gentleman will have my earnest support. I believe these schools ought to be reduced and in the near future ought to be cut off entirely, except a limited number, where you might select from the reservation schools the more promising young men and women and give them an education that will qualify them to lead their tribes as teachers, mechanics, etc.

True, in some localities where conditions are so divergent and different the schools may be located off the reservation, owing to local conditions, and be in fact the equivalent of a reservation school. So my friend from Ohio in his efforts in the future to reduce the nonreservation school will have my support. Break up the reservations, allot the lands, teach the Indian industrial pursuits, throw the power of the school about their homes, and one generation will see them self-supporting and many of them intelligent citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GROSVENOR, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15804, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WOODSMAN'S HANDBOOK.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the Woodsman's Handbook, part 1, being Bulletin 36, Bureau of Forestry, United States Department of Agriculture, be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office for the use of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire simply to say, for the information in advance of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] who is chairman of the Committee on Printing that this is one of the few practical books that Senators may have for distribution among their constituents. The Department of Agriculture printed an edition, which is entirely exhausted, and I have a very considerable number of applications now on file for it. I hope the Senator will give the resolution immediate attention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

OREGON AND WASHINGTON INDIAN WAR.

Mr. SIMON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 2,500 copies of House of Representatives Executive Document No. 38, Thirty-fifth Congress, first session, being letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a report on the Indian war in Oregon and Washington Territories.

HYDROGRAPHY OF THE AMERICAN ISTHMUS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

HEARINGS ON PURE-FOOD BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That 2,500 copies of the additional hearings before the Committee on Manufactures upon the pure-food bills, be printed, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 500 copies for the use of the Committee on Manufactures.

CUBAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. DIETRICH. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask that it be printed and ordered to lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Relations with Cuba be discharged from any further consideration of House bill 12765 and all other bills pertaining to Cuban reciprocity.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President, I give notice that I expect to address the Senate upon the resolution in a few days. It is evident that Cuban reciprocity and other important measures are being held in status QUAY; that unless some relief soon comes to Cuba the island will be depopulated by starvation, and American industries will suffer until there will be another panic in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator.

COURTS-MARTIAL IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. RAWLINS on the 27th instant, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands, and what judgments rendered by them in consequence of the dispatch sent by the Secretary of War to Major-General Chaffee referred to in the memorandum of the Secretary of War for the Adjutant-General under date of April 15, 1902; also what action was taken by the President or the Secretary of War on the judgment of any court-martial so ordered, either approving or disapproving the same.

Also, that the records in full of the several following courts-martial ordered and held in the Philippine Islands be communicated, to wit:

That on Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith.
That on Maj. Edwin F. Glenn, Fifth Infantry.
That on Lieut. Edwin A. Hickman, First Cavalry.
That on Lieut. J. H. A. Day, Marine Corps.
That on Maj. L. W. T. Waller, of the Marine Corps.
That on Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry.
That on Capt. James A. Ryan, Fifteenth Cavalry.
That on Lieut. —— Cooke.
That on Lieut. Julian E. Galyot.
That on Lieut. N. E. Cook, of the Philippine Scouts.
That on Lieut. W. S. Sinclair, battalion adjutant, Twenty-eighth Infantry.

Also, any record or reports of investigations which may be on file in the War Department relating to the case of the so-called "Father Augustine," alleged to have been put to death by Cornelius M. Brownell, formerly a captain of the Twenty-sixth Volunteer Infantry, at Banate, island of Panay, province of Iloilo, in December, 1900, also any investigations made by the Department of Justice into the facts of such case, together with any legal conclusions reached thereon and reported to the War Department.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] gave notice that he intended to speak upon the resolution this morning.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I gave notice, Mr. President, that I intended to make only a few remarks on this question. Yesterday at the close of the morning hour, when the resolution had been discussed for some time, it was my desire, if I could then have gotten a minute or two, to have made a suggestion in regard to it.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF CARTERSVILLE, GA.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1147) for the relief of the First Baptist Church of Cartersville, Ga. I am sure it will not lead to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the pending business may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $5,000 to the trustees or other legal representatives of the First Baptist Church of Cartersville, Ga., or their successors in office, in trust for the use and benefit of the church, in full for all the damages claimed by the church, or any person heretofore or hereafter claiming to represent the church, for brick and all other building materials taken and used by the Army of the United Seates during the late war; and the acceptance by the trustees of this sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims of every name and nature for the use or occupation of the church or the appropriation and use of the materials of the same, or in any manner arising or growing out of the use thereof.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I should be glad if the Senator from Georgia would explain the purpose of this bill. I did not hear the reading of it. The Senator, as I understood, asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He did.

Mr. QUAY. I merely ask what is the character of the bill?

Mr. CLAY. It is simply to pay a claim of the First Baptist Church of Cartersville, Ga., which was destroyed. The bill was unanimously passed upon and reported three different times from the House committee, and had a unanimous report from the Senate committee. There is no objection to the bill.

Mr. QUAY. Has there been a written report made upon the bill?

Mr. CLAY. There is a report from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. QUAY. I should be very glad to hear the report read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. Warren on the 28th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1147) for the relief of the First Baptist Church of Cartersville, Ga., having had the same under careful consideration, beg leave to report it back to the Senate without amendment and to recommend that it do pass.

The facts in the case being fully set forth in House Report No. 197, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, your committee have adopted that report, which reads as follows:

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1147) for the relief of the First Baptist Church of Cartersville, Ga., beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment.

"The proof filed in support of the bill shows that in the year 1864, while the Army of the United States were in possession of said town of Cartersville, the Baptist church building was torn down by them and the brick and lumber of said church building were used by said United States soldiers in building for themselves quarters and in building chimneys to their tents. The brick and lumber taken and used by the Army was valued at the time at $5,000.

"When buildings are torn down, if the materials are taken to erect other buildings for the use of the Army, such materials thereby become supplies, and their value, as materials for the purpose for which they are used, is paid to the owner. It is a very inadequate compensation to him; but this rule, which allows only for the materials as supplies, and nothing for damage to the building from which they are obtained, has been acted upon uniformly for many years, and is regarded as an established usage not to be departed from.

"Capt. George A. Clarke, late provost-marshal, makes the following affidavit:

"That from July 5 to November 12, 1864, he was captain of Company H, Fourth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and provost-marshal of the Third Division of the Fifteenth Army Corps, United States Army, and was stationed and in charge at Cartersville, Ga., and was well acquainted with the circumstances of the destruction of the First Baptist Church of said city. That about the last of the month of September or the first part of the month of October, 1864, a portion of the cavalry troops belonging to the command of General McCook were stationed in said city, and they took and carried away, for the construction of huts and shelters for themselves, the seats and pews of said church, and also stabled their horses in said church, and that afterwards, during the same fall, said troops and other United States troops tore down the walls of said church and used the brick and other materials of said building for the erection of chimneys to their huts and tents, and for their use and comfort.

"That said church was the property of the Baptist Church of said city to the best of deponent's knowledge and belief, and was used by them as a place of worship, and was a nice brick church, worth from $5,000 to $7,000. That said United States troops received the full benefit of the materials of said church buildings and the use thereof.

GEORGE A. CLARKE,
"Late Captain, Fourth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and Provost-
"Marshal Third Division, Fifteenth Army Corps, U. S. Volunteers.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this June 24, 1889.

"F. M. DURHAM,
"Clerk Supreme Court, Barlow County, Ga.

"Your committee recommend the passage of the bill."

Mr. QUAY. I think I understand the case now, and so I shall not ask for any further reading of the report.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I suggest in view of the fact——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. QUAY. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course the reading of the report has now served the Senator's purpose, but I suggest, the report having been partly read to the Senator's satisfaction, that all of it ought to be read for the satisfaction of the other members of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report has been read entirely through.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought it had not been, as the Senator from Pennsylvania stated that he did not desire to have any more of it read.

Mr. QUAY. I did not know that the reading had been completed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course what was read served the Senator's purpose, but had it not all been read, I wanted to have it read through.

Mr. CLAY. I sincerely hope that the Senator from Indiana will allow the bill to pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF AARON VAN CAMP AND VIRGINIUS P. CHAPIN.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Committee on Claims to the bill (S. 342) for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

1. That the Senate concur in that portion of the House amendment striking out all the words after the word "Documents," on lines 16 and 17, page 2, down to and including the word "Government," on line 19, page 2.

2. That the House recedes from all the balance of its amendment to said bill.

F. E. WARREN,
P. J. McCUMBER,
JAMES P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
D. J. FOSTER,
CLAUDE KITCHEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. QUAY. I rise, Mr. President, merely to inquire whether the morning business has been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution pending before the Senate, coming over from a former day, on which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] has the floor, and has been recognized.

Mr. QUAY. I did not know that.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

Mr. BURNHAM. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me to ask for the consideration of a private bill, which will take but a minute or two.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I yield to the Senator for the purpose of asking for the taking up of the bill.

G. W. RATLEFF.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3354) for the relief of G. W. Ratleff.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to G. W. Ratleff, of Ivey, W. Va., $354, for building material taken by Union troops in the town of Buckhannon, W. Va., during the late war of the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATRICK O'DONNELL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Mississippi if he will permit me to ask for the consideration of a pension case that is of a most distressing nature, and which will take but a moment.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6229) granting a pension to Patrick O'Donnell.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, before the word "seaman," to strike out "a;" in the same line, after the word "seaman," to strike out "in the," and in line 7, before the word "dollars," to fill the blank by inserting "thirty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Patrick W. O'Donnell, late seaman, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NELLIE ETT HEEN.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. With pleasure.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 12240, which has been before the Senate once, and has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12240) granting to Nellie Ett Heen the south half of the northwest quarter and lot 4 of section 2 and lot 1 of section 3, in township 154 north, of range 101 west, in the State of North Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has once been read in full to the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALDRICH. What bill is it? I should like to have the Senator from North Dakota explain it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Then I will allow the bill to be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There is quite a long preamble to the bill, and I think, perhaps, I can explain in a brief way the purpose of the bill.

The bill grants to Mrs. Heen a quarter section of land in the State of North Dakota. Mrs. Heen is the wife of an alien who came to this country from China in 1876, and who afterwards married an American woman. They had one child. Seven years ago he offered his filing in the land office at Minot, N. Dak., on a quarter section of land. The filing was accepted, he proceeded to make a residence upon the land, and has lived there constantly for seven years. Recently, when he undertook to make final proof on the land, the final proof was rejected because he was an alien.

Mr. President, this family has been laboring under peculiar hardships. This woman to whom it is proposed to make this grant of 160 acres of land is an American citizen, and I think it will be conceded that her child is an American citizen.

I do not believe that the passage of this bill will establish a bad precedent. I doubt if there is another case like it existing, or that there ever will be one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. QUARLES. I understand that my colleague [Mr. SPOONER] when this bill was called up on a former occasion interposed an objection, and inasmuch as he is necessarily absent at this time, I feel constrained to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope the Senator will not object. I had a talk with the Senator's colleague about the matter. I do not care to detail the conversation I had with him on the subject after he had objected, but if the Senator had been present when that conversation was had with his colleague I am sure he would not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not ask to have the bill read for the purpose of interposing an objection; but after the allegations, which have been made here very freely, and I do not know but they have been made elsewhere, in regard to the bill validating certain Pima County bonds, I thought it was important that all bills relating to matters of this kind should be explained by some one; and I therefore asked the Senator from North Dakota to explain the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I trust the explanation has been to the satisfaction of the Senator.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was rejected.

COURTS-MARTIAL IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. RAWLINS on the 27th instant, directing the Secretary of War to inform the Senate what courts-martial have been ordered and held in the Philippine Islands, etc.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, I repeat that if I could have obtained the floor yesterday morning to have made a few suggestions, which would not have taken more than two minutes, I should not have asked that the resolution retain its place on the table. I wanted to suggest, and do suggest, to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the chairman of the Philippines Committee, that he at least make no objection to that part of the resolution which requests the Secretary of War to send the records of the trial of Lieut. W. S. Sinclair.

As I remember, during the debate last session on the bill to raise revenue for the Philippine Islands and the bill for the government of the Philippine Islands, it came out in the papers that there had been a private soldier tortured to death by order of Lieutenant Sinclair. I was prepared to hear the argument and statements made by those of the opposite political party from myself in the Chamber that what has occurred between the Filipinos and the American soldiers was just exactly what was to be expected when we started in this business of imperialism, when the war was declared—whenever that was I do not know, because I believe the Constitution of the United States requires that the Congress of the United States shall declare war—but anyway, when there was a state of war between the American Government and the Philippine Islands, it was to be expected by all those who had brought on the war by the treaty with Spain that turned over to us for $20,000,000 the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people, that just exactly what has occurred there would occur—that the Filipinos, being an inferior race of people, a savage and barbarous race, would kill and torture American soldiers and American citizens who went to the islands, and that in retaliation American soldiers would torture to the extreme the Filipinos; that when it was shown that the most cruel torture, at least of the last century and the short part of this century, had been practiced in the Philippine Islands both by the Filipinos and our people; when it was shown that whole sections of the country were ordered to be laid waste by fire and sword, and when one-third of the population of some of the islands had been destroyed by the occupation of the islands by the American Government—whether by disease or whether by torture, or whatever was the cause—still one-third of the population in certain sections of the islands was destroyed; and when it was shown that old men had been taken out and robbed of their money, men who had been faithful to the flag of the United States ever since the acquisition of the territory—if it was acquired by the treaty with Spain—not only men who had been loyal to the Government of the United States, but who had in their possession the certificate of the American general commanding the army there of peculiarly good service to the American Government, had been taken out and robbed; when it was shown that men wearing the American uniform had outraged 12-year-old girls, and women with babes in the cradle not over 4 months old, and when they had taken the men of those islands and compelled them to dig their own graves and shot them down in their graves, it was said——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I shall yield in a moment for a question only, but before I do let me finish my sentence.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It was said in substance by those who advocated this policy of imperialism that that was to have been expected, before the war commenced, when we took possession of the islands. That was the substance of the defense which was made for those acts. Now, what is the question of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator what person it was who was wearing the uniform of the United States who outraged the women that he speaks about? I do not remember the name of any such person myself. I have no doubt the Senator does.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I do remember. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that I read in the Senate in the discussion of this question on the 15th or 16th of May last—I do not remember which day, but I spoke on the 15th and 16th of May last—I read a report of an American officer, the inspector-general, Major McKenna, I believe it was, though I have not the RECORD now before me, detailing these very circumstances, and when that went to the brigadier-general for his action upon it he stated that these were Macabebe soldiers wearing the American uniform and that they were savages.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They were not, then, American soldiers?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir; they were American soldiers. They were wearing the American uniform.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I mean that even conceding the Senator's charge to be true, about which I know nothing——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It is all in the record——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But about which I have my own opinion——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. As the Senator will find if he will examine it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator does not mean American volunteers from this country.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. No, sir; I do not mean them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the point.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I mean they were American soldiers; and that is the objection I have to the policy of the party of the Senator from Indiana, that they are disgracing the uniform of the American soldier by putting it upon these Macabebe savages, and it ought never to have been put upon him. No policy can be justified and defended that puts the uniform upon those savages.

Now, I say, when all this is shown——

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. With pleasure.

Mr. CARMACK. I suggest to the Senator that General——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Over here we can not hear the Senator from Tennessee at all; none of us can.

Mr. CARMACK. I suggest that General Wheaton, in his report concerning certain outrages perpetrated by the Macabebe savages, said that when they were first employed in the service of the United States it was done with the apprehension that just such acts would be committed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Who was that?

Mr. CARMACK. General Wheaton. That they were Malay savages and were given to such practices. He said further that it was absolutely necessary, in order to carry on the war successfully, to employ these savages, as they were the only people in the Philippine Islands who were not hostile to the American Government.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. When we were discussing this question, it was stated substantially by the opposition party in the Senate, in the debate on the Philippine policy, that it was to be expected that there would be torture of our soldiers by the Filipinos and torture of the Filipinos by our soldiers. I have answered that by saying that that was just my objection to the policy of imperialism. But here is a case where it is not a Filipino who is tortured.

Grant, for the sake of this argument, that it is right—although we have the statement of the President of the United States that it is not right—but grant that the argument must be sustained by showing that it is right to torture Filipinos in retaliation for their torture of our soldiers, the American soldiers; grant that it ought to be defended here in the Senate of the United States, and that it is a good defense to say that these people have tortured American soldiers and therefore the American officers ought to torture the Filipinos; that where one American soldier's blood is shed there ought to be the blood of a hundred Filipinos shed, and that it ought to be shed by the most cruel torture that can be conceived in the human brain, yet does the policy of imperialism go to the extent that there must be torture of a private soldier, not a Filipino, not a Macabebe, but a private soldier of American birth, by the command of an American officer, without trial, and for what? Because he had gotten hold of some whisky or beer or wine, which, according to the report of the Secretary of War, compose the majority of exports from this country to Manila, and getting hold of it, became somewhat intoxicated and used some language to his superior officer that violated the regulations of the American Army.

I say, has it come to this, that an American-born citizen who volunteers in the American Army for the purpose of serving his country as a soldier shall be tortured to death by the officer who is in command of him, and that without trial, without court-martial, just because the private has used some language to the officer that he takes as an insult, the private being under the intoxicating influence of the beverage that goes across as the majority of the exports of this country to Manila? And must we be denied the benefit of the evidence upon which the officer who ordered this unlawful execution of the soldier was acquitted?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. For a question I do, but not to inject a speech into mine.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Mississippi has never had the experience of having me inject a speech into any speech of his, and I do rise for a question.

The Senator is discussing the evils and infamies of what he calls the imperial policy, and citing instances. He has just cited the instance of a private soldier who he said was tortured to death by one of our officers for breach of discipline. Does the Senator connect that with the policy of acquiring the Philippines? Was that done simply because they were in the Philippines? Might not that have been done anywhere?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator has not caught my argument.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, I have tried to.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir. I take it it is because I have not been able to make myself intelligible. I have said that the policy in the Philippine Islands and all the acts between the Filipinos and the American soldiers and officers there were justified, in substance, by the Republican party upon the ground that it was understood when this policy was embarked upon that just such things would occur. That is my objection to the policy of imperialism, or one of the serious objections that I have to the policy of imperialism. It is not my only objection.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator will wait——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. And give me an opportunity to answer his question. I have not said that the cruel torture of Richter—I believe that is his name—who I understand was an American citizen, of German parents, born in this country—was due to the Philippine policy, but I will say this: Of course it is a matter of conjecture with me as it is with the Senator from Indiana. In my opinion, if the American Army instead of being 7,000 miles from the American shore had been on the territory of the United States here at home, such a thing never would have been done, and never would have been dared to have been done by an American officer. I do not believe—and I believe my opinion about it is the opinion of the American people—that Lieutenant Sinclair, if he had been in the State of Indiana, would have dared to order the torture to death of that poor private soldier, who was helpless in the power of an officer in his command. That is what I say about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I will hear a question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator shows that I did catch his argument, and that in citing this case of punishment of a soldier for infraction of discipline he went out of the scope of his argument, because I now understand that he clearly disavows that this was caused by that.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. No, sir; I do not disavow that it was caused by his being in the Philippines. I merely stated that I had not said it was caused by that; but I am prepared to say, and have said now, since the Senator made the suggestion, that I believe, and it is reasonable to believe, that Lieutenant Sinclair never would have ordered the torture of that man if he had been in the Senator's State, the State of Indiana. I should like to know whether the Senator believes that Lieutenant Sinclair, if he had been quartered somewhere in Indiana, would have ordered the torture to death of this man?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the excellent effect of living in Indiana, of course, will be admitted by everyone, and I am glad to hear the Senator call attention to it. At the same time I will not undertake to say what would have been the state of this lieutenant's mind whether he lived there or anywhere else. But the important thing has been declared, after all, that the Senator does think a severe punishment for an infraction of discipline was caused by the Philippine policy. He had not stated that before, and I am surprised, though glad, that he states it at last.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, I think myself Indiana is a very good State. It has favored us with two very good men for Senators in this body, and I have no reason to believe that they would permit in the State of Indiana the torture of a man to death. I can say this, that I do not believe there is a State in the Union where, if Sinclair, lieutenant as he was in the Army, had ordered the torture of a man to death, even though a man under his command as a private soldier, he would not have been taken before the courts and tried and convicted and either sentenced to the penitentiary for life or hanged for it. That is, if we have not come to that time in the history of the Republic when the military is superior to the civil authorities.

If we still recognize the civil authority as superior to the military authorities, the Senator knows and the Senate knows that if it be true, as the papers stated, that this man was tortured to death by order of Sinclair, without a trial and without a court-martial, without any charge being preferred against him officially, that Sinclair would have been guilty of murder and subject to the laws of the State where he committed the offense, and, being guilty of murder, he would have been tried and executed, and he ought to have been tried and executed if he did it as stated by the papers here. That is the reason why I am very anxious that objection in this particular case shall be waived by the dominant party in the Senate, for I know they have the power to vote down the resolution. I hope there is not anything in the trial of Lieutenant Sinclair the divulging of which would be detrimental to the Republican party. If there is, it ought to be brought out, and the people ought to know it, and they ought to have an opportunity to discipline that party.

This private soldier ought to be protected. The laws ought to protect the humblest private soldier in the American ranks. There ought to be no Macabebe savages employed, because they are not amenable to any law. They are not a law-abiding people themselves. They are not governed by law. The law ought to protect the humblest American citizen, whether he is in the ranks as a volunteer soldier or whether he is in civil life. What we want to accomplish, and what I want to ask, is that Senators shall waive any objection to getting the facts as to this man Sinclair, because we ought to see upon what testimony Sinclair was acquitted of the murder of this man, when, I believe, the finding of the court was in effect that he was tortured to death by order of Sinclair because the private soldier, when under the influence of intoxicants, had used some offensive language to Sinclair.

I did not intend to say more than merely to ask that we be permitted to see the record of the trial of Sinclair. Since I am on my feet I want to say this in reference to the private soldier. I believe the private soldier ought to have some rights in the Army. I believe that private soldiers of the Army are such men as are entitled to some part in the discipline of the Army. I believe that the private soldiers of our Army are gentlemen. I believe that the personnel of the private soldiers of our Army compares favorably with the personnel of the officers, and that they ought to have some part in the discipline. Yet a private soldier has no more to do with the discipline of the Army, he has no more rights or liberties in the Army than a galley slave has. And there is no use to deny it.

It is true they have army regulations which say that an officer shall not impose upon the private soldier any menial service for the officer's own benefit and advantage. But how is the private soldier going to see that that is observed? Suppose he is ordered to black the shoes of the general? Suppose he is ordered to catch and saddle his horse and bridle him? Suppose he is ordered to brighten up the sword of the officer and he refuses to do so? There are so many ways—they are almost illimitable—by which the officer can impose hardships upon the private soldier that he is absolutely compelled to do this menial service when he is told to do it by command of the officer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. For a question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. For a question. The Senator has made a very important suggestion, which is that the private should participate in the discipline which is exercised over him, and I wish to ask the Senator to suggest to the Senate and to the country just how he would practically carry that out?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I suggested it in an amendment which I offered to the military bill some days ago, and the Senator's party voted it down before you could hardly have time to breathe.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. If the Senator will wait, I will state what my view is. I should make a provision that it should subject an officer to court-martial, and upon conviction he should be cashiered, whenever he gives an order to a private soldier to do any menial service for his (the officer's) own benefit or private advantage. That is one thing, and that is one of the provisions which I put into the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, did——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Wait a moment. If an officer gave any such order, I would allow charges to be made against him by the private soldier or by any private soldier, and then upon the trial of that officer I would have one-half of the members of the court-martial composed of private soldiers of the same class of service as the private soldier who was thus offended. That is one way I would do it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not hear the Senator's amendment, and I do not wonder, after his explanation, that the Senate instantly voted it down.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would ask the Senator how he would expect discipline to be maintained under such a system, where in the course of war (I see the Senator's adviser going to his side; no doubt I shall have a quick answer) soldiers might be discontented, or because they were ordered to some service might want to do something against an officer? How could the Senator expect that discipline could at all be maintained? I know the Senator has been a soldier, and I ask him to answer that out of his own experience.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir; I have been a soldier and a private soldier, and I know something of the private soldier's position and what he has to undergo.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And a good one, I know.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Thank you, sir; I was not fishing for a compliment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I can not refrain from complimenting the Senator upon a matter like that. I have as great admiration——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me for a moment. This is a personal matter. I have as great admiration for the courage and soldierly qualities of those who fought upon one side of that regrettable conflict as I have for those who fought on the other side, who number members of my own blood, and I paid that compliment to the Senator in sincerest good faith.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, the Senator assumes that the private soldier is an unworthy man.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No. No man does or can more earnestly admire and champion him.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. That he is unworthy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE, No; the Senator will pardon me. I assume nothing of the kind. On the contrary I assert the reverse.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Very well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He is a very worthy man, but he is in the Army, and an army is an army, and discipline is discipline.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Then it surely is within the power of the officers commanding the Army to select private soldiers who will do justice to the officer and to the private soldier.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me? The Senator assumes that we select officers who will do injustice.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is the point.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. That I assume, and I know it is true. I have seen officers require soldiers to do menial service for them. We have officers of that kind. I do not assert that, as a rule, we select officers who will do injustice, but yet we have such officers, and such officers ought to be weeded out of the service of the United States Army. That is my idea about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator does admit that the assumption which I say he makes——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. If the Senator has any further questions, I will yield to him.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; it is a question. I shall not interrupt the Senator again if he so prefers. This is the course of ordinary running debate, and if the Senator does not wish to be interrupted except for a question, I will confine myself to questions.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I prefer that the Senator should confine himself to questions, because he will have his own time. He has spoken on this same subject for hours.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will put it in the form of a question, because it is important that it should be nailed down one way or the other. I have no desire to misunderstand, much less to misinterpret the Senator. The Senator does not admit that what I said a moment ago, and what he then admitted, that his assumption is that we select officers who will do injustice, is correct, and that he makes such assumption.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I say this. We have officers in our Army who do injustice to private soldiers. I know that as a fact. I do not assume anything. I know it to be a fact that we have such officers. I do not assert that as a rule they do injustice to the soldier, but I do assert we have officers in the Army who do injustice to the private soldier, who give them orders to perform for them menial service which they have no right to order them to do. Such officers ought to be weeded out.

I have said it is possible, and not only possible, but easy, for the authorities to find private soldiers to put on courts-martial, who will do justice to the officer and to the private soldier. And if we have soldiers who are gentlemen, if we have soldiers who are worthy of the American uniform—as I contend we have—if the vast mass of our soldiers are worthy of the American uniform, which I contend they are, then they would have no trouble to find private soldiers who can be put upon these courts-martial to try an officer who has mistreated a private soldier and for which mistreatment he is being tried.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A question.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Those private soldiers ought to be put upon the courts-martial.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. For a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, sir; for a question. Can not the Senator imagine, without great difficulty, the case of an unworthy soldier (because there are unworthy men in all vocations of life), a discontented soldier, one who has a grudge against an officer who would falsely make such a charge as that without foundation or basis, just simply because of his spite against the officer, and thus cause, by the Senator's plan, a civil procedure in a military organization—a long trial and investigation of it? Can not the Senator imagine such a case as that?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I can imagine such a case. Cases of that kind occur.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes. What would be the effect of that on discipline?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. If the Senator will allow me to get through, I do not contend that every man in the ranks as a private soldier is worthy the uniform of the United States. It would be impossible to get that, but I contend that they will compare favorably with the officers who wear the uniform of officers of the American Army. I contend that the proportion of those who are gentlemen and who are worthy of the American uniform is as great among the private soldiers as among the officers.

Mr. BEVERIDGE rose.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Let me get through before the Senator asks another question. As to the point the Senator made a while ago, the private soldier has now the right to prefer a charge against his officer, but when it comes to be tried, it is tried by officers alone, and a private soldier has none of his class of service on the court-martial. When the private soldier makes a charge against an officer of maltreatment of the private soldier, when the court-martial meets, not a civil tribunal—I would not ask for a civil tribunal, and in the amendment I offered a few days ago to the military bill I did not ask for a civil tribunal—I would provide that one-half of the court-martial should be composed of private soldiers, gentlemen, as the Senator admits they are, in the Army of the United States, and the officers who select the court-martial will have the opportunity to select from private soldiers, the mass of whom are gentlemen.

Now, when the trial is held, if it turns out that they are false charges against the officer, made by the private soldier for some pique or to gratify some spite or ill will or malice, the court-martial, composed one-half of officers and one-half of private soldiers, will do justice to the officer and acquit him of any offense. But if he has been guilty of any offense against the private soldier, if he has given him an order to do work for him—menial service for him—as he would a galley slave, they would convict him and cashier him under the amendment which I offered, and they ought to do it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. If the Senator will hold on for a few moments——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to ask a question right here.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Very well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Out with it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is that upon the assumption that the trial board as now constituted would not do justice? The Senator suggests a change, that instead of the trial board being all officers it should be half privates. Why does the Senator make that suggested change, unless it is upon the ground that the trial board composed of all officers would not do justice? Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. My position is that when you are trying a private soldier you ought to have some of his class of service on the court-martial.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Because——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. When you are trying an officer for an offense against a private soldier, the private soldier ought to have at least half of the court-martial composed of his own peers. They are more likely to do justice to him than a board composed entirely of officers.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator say that the board composed entirely of officers would not do justice to a private soldier? And if so, is the Senator's assumption borne out by history?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I have answered the Senator's question time and again, that the board composed one-half of officers and one-half of private soldiers would be more likely to do justice to the private soldier than a board composed entirely of officers. Then I will say another thing, that if you had a court-martial so composed and a law as my amendment proposed there would be a great deal more care exercised by the officers in the arbitrary and often despotic command to private soldiers than there is now. But I am admonished by the clock that the morning hour is expiring.

Here is a statement of the Secretary of War. The reason I want to stop the colloquy is that the time is expiring, and I want to get in a reference to this speech. The Secretary of War in a speech made a few days ago said, speaking of the Army:

> It is an army of citizens of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. From a speech made by the Secretary of War. I believe it was yesterday that he made a speech in which he said:

> It is an army of citizens of the United States, volunteers all of them. It is a volunteer army. It is an army of citizens, each of whom is educated, for there is an educational test upon admission.

Now, the Senator says that my amendment was promptly and properly voted down because the amendment was such a one as ought not to be adopted and ought not to be in the military regulations of the United States. That was an amendment which gave a private soldier the poor privilege of setting on a court-martial when another private soldier was being tried, the poor privilege of having his case tried, when he has been oppressed by an officer, by a court-martial composed one-half of private soldiers. Here are these men, educated men; men who were subjected to an educational test before they were permitted to enter the Army.

Yet it is said there can not be selected from that class of men one-half of a court-martial who would do justice and who could be relied upon to enforce discipline in the Army, and that if we should do that the Army would go to pieces in time of peace or war. I insist that the Secretary of War says one thing and acts another; that he speaks one thing by his tongue and acts another by his military orders and by his military conduct.

It is all very well to parade before the public that the Secretary of War has the idea that the private soldier is an educated man, a capable man, and a gentleman. That is all very well to go out as the opinion of the Secretary of War to the world. But when it comes to act he acts upon a different assumption.

Right here, while I think about it, I wish to say that the Senator from Indiana yesterday spoke of the American uniform and said that it ought not to be assailed; that the American uniform ought to be understood to clothe a man as an honorable man. I agree to that. I want to do it. But when you conceal the misconduct of the few American officers who are guilty of crime, is that the way it is going to be done? Is it going to be made the emblem of honor by keeping them within the Army and by making no distinction between officers who are corrupt, officers who are murderous, officers who are cruel torturers, and the officers who are honorable and perform their duty and the private soldiers who perform their duty? Is there going to be no distinction made? Is that the way you are going to make the American Army an emblem of honor?

No, the way to do it is to weed out all those not worthy of the uniform, so that when a person sees a man with the American uniform on walking down the street he knows that he is a gentleman, because it is the rule of the American Government not to permit any man to wear that uniform who is not a worthy and an honest man. You can not do that by concealing the trials and court-martials of men who have tortured American private soldiers.

Last year, when Secretary Root was driven to send in a defense of the charges which had been made by American soldiers against American officers, he sent in this document, and I want to call your attention to it. He sent in this document as a part of his case.

When a man in a lawsuit enters before a jury a document he vouches for its correctness; he indorses that document. Here is the document. Here is the document that the Secretary of War indorsed. Here is a part of the statement of Gen. Frederick Funston, a brigadier-general, and I believe no man was more eulogized at the last session, when we had this Philippine question before the Senate. Here is what he said:

> Statements of this kind made by returned soldiers are simply braggadocio and a desire to attract attention to themselves.

There is no truth in it; it is just said as braggadocio, unreliable, unworthy of credence; it is braggadocio; it is done to attract attention to themselves and it is void of truth. Now, that is slandering the American Army.

Mr. BEVERIDGE rose.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Does the Senator wish to interrupt me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Very well; I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator, from his own large and rich experience as a soldier, and a gallant one, whether he does not know that that is occasionally true?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It is not the statement of this brigadier-general that it is occasionally true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does he say that it is universally true?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I will read it again to the Senator. If it does not say that in so many words, it can bear no other construction. I know it is a fact, as I have said before, that all private soldiers are not honorable and worthy men, but as a rule they are worthy men. Now listen:

> Statements of this kind made by returned soldiers are simply braggadocio and a desire to attract attention to themselves.

Where is the exception? It is not given here. It brands all the statements as being devoid of truth, because when it says that they are simply braggadocio it means that they have not anything else in them and that there is no truth in them. It is unworthy of a brigadier-general to speak——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask just one question and then I will not interrupt the Senator any more. Who was it said that?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Gen. Frederick Funston.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think that General Funston meant those words to apply indiscriminately to all soldiers in the Army, as the Senator has just stated?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. If he did not mean it he ought not to have said it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think so?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I only know what he meant from what he said.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think that is what he meant should be understood?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I can not think anything else. I do not know of anything else that he could mean by it. I can only judge of what he means by his language here. I am not acquainted with General Funston, except through his writings and through his speeches. He says that is true; and from all I have heard of him and read of him I believe he is capable of making almost any statement. I believe he wanted to have a venerable Senator in this body hung because he objected to the imperial policy in the Philippine Islands. I think he wanted to have hung an ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives—Hon. Tom Reed, who was known all over this country and who died some time ago—because he held the same views the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] holds. Having that kind of an idea about it, I can interpret his language in no other way than that it means just exactly what he says. If he wants to plead the baby act, or if the Senator wants to plead the baby act for him, then of course that may be done.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to have the Senator say whether he himself thinks that General Funston meant that that statement should be applied indiscriminately to every soldier in the Army.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. If the Senator will allow me, I will tell him just what I think General Funston meant. I think he meant just what he said——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So do I.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. And that is what he said. I hope the Senator will let me proceed. Let us go on a little further. There have been some murders in the Army.

Let me say another thing. There was not on the other side any Republican Senator last year who defended the private soldier if he was on the side of the Philippine bill or the side of the tariff bill for the Philippine Islands. There was not a word said by them in vindication or in justification or in defense of the private soldier, and when they spoke of the Army it was spoken of as the officers of the Army; and as one Senator said, the American officer will not lie, implying, I supposed then, and I suppose now, that the American private soldier would lie. I believe his language was that the American officer would not lie and steal; and that the expression of one is the exclusion of others is a law maxim which a tyro in the profession of law first learns.

But here is another major-general in the United States Army, Major-General Otis, writing on the 29th of May, 1899. This is from a document sent in by the Secretary of War, and thereby indorsed by him. Major-General Otis says:

> While there is little truth in letters written by soldiers to their homes——

Ah! if there is little truth; then all the balance must be falsehood. If all the balance is falsehood, then the soldier is a man accustomed to lying, and he who is accustomed to lying is a liar. There is the denunciation as plain as the inference can be made that all the soldiers who write home letters to their people, whether to father, brothers, sisters, wife, daughter, or son, are liars. Who is slandering the American Army? Have Republican Senators said a word against General Otis because of this slander in making their claimed defense of the American Army?

It is very easy to get up and say there is a syndicate of slander, a syndicate of defamation here; but when you come down to the actual facts of the case who of them has ever said a word in denunciation of General Otis for this vile slander when defending the American Army against the alleged slander of Democrats in the Senate? Not one. Oh, no; when you are slandering the American Army you are slandering the American officers. How? By showing that certain American officers have been guilty of outrages and want to call the attention of the War Department and of the Administration to them, so that they may weed them out of the Army and have the Army composed of officers and men who are worthy of the uniform they wear, that when they are seen with that uniform they may be known to be honorable and upright gentlemen.

I see that the morning hour is nearly over. The Senator had a great deal to say yesterday about a statement which was made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] as to an officer who had committed a cold-blooded murder, and he called for one specification. I am going to give the Senator from Indiana a specification. It is on page 2097 of the hearings before the Committee on the Philippines of the United States Senate on affairs on the Philippine Islands.

Here is a charge made against an American officer, Lieut. Preston Brown, first lieutenant. The charge was murder in violation of the fifty-eighth article of war. What is the specification?

Specification.—In that First. Lieut. Preston Brown, Second Infantry, did willfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, murder and kill by shooting with a pistol an unarmed, unresisting native Filipino, name unknown, a prisoner of war in his charge, and as a result of said shooting the native did then and there die.

Now—

This at a time of insurrection in the Philippine Islands, under the military government of the United States, at or near Binangonan, Infanta Province, Luzon, P. I., on or about December 22, 1900.

That is the specification. What did they find him guilty of? They did not find him guilty of murder, but they found him guilty of manslaughter and sentenced him to five years at hard labor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Who found him guilty?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The court-martial.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Composed of brother officers?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How astonishing!

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Wait a moment. Here is what they found him guilty of. They found him guilty of manslaughter. I would like to ask a question of the Senator as a lawyer, as ridiculous as this seems to him, because I see his risibles indicate that he considers it very ridiculous. As ridiculous as it seems, I want to know of the Senator as a lawyer if he does not believe that the finding of the court-martial is a finding in fact of murder and that the only palliating circumstance was that it was an officer? Now, what do they find him guilty of?

Of the specification, "Guilty, except the words 'feloniously and with malice aforethought murder and,' and of the excepted words not guilty."

What, then, did they find him guilty of?

"Did willfully * * * kill by shooting with a pistol an unarmed, unresisting native Filipino, name unknown, a prisoner of war in his charge."

He was found guilty of willfully killing an unarmed man, an unresisting man, who was a prisoner in his charge; and that court-martial found that he was not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter. Does not the Senator know, does not any lawyer know, that he was guilty of murder?

Now, what did they do with that officer? He was not sent to the penitentiary.

WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1902.

So much of the sentence in this case as imposes imprisonment is disapproved, and so much of the sentence as imposes dismissal is confirmed and commuted to a reduction of 30 files in lineal rank on the list of first lieutenants of infantry and a forfeiture of one-half of the officer's monthly pay for a period of nine months.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By direction of the Secretary of War, First Lieut. Preston Brown, Second United States Infantry, will be released from arrest and restored to duty.

That is, the officer was released from arrest and restored to duty, with no punishment at all except that one-half of his pay was deducted for nine months. His pay for nine months was deducted, and he is now, so far as the records show, holding a commission in the United States Army.

But the next man was a private soldier, who had killed, not a prisoner, but a woman, and I suppose it would be about on a par whether he killed a woman or killed a prisoner who was of an inferior race and who was in his charge. That private soldier was not reduced 35 numbers in rank, but he was executed for the offense.

Now, what is the difference? Will the Senator look at that? These are the two very first cases that come in this list. The Senator laughs.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not laughing. I am simply looking pleasantly at the Senator.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It is no laughing matter. I know the Senator was laughing a while ago when I spoke of the fact that this man had been convicted by a court-martial of the crime of manslaughter. It may be a laughable matter to him, but it is not a laughable fact to me that a man who holds a commission and commits a crime just as diabolical—the officer in the American Army, wearing the uniform of the American soldier, with the American sword belted around him—is acquitted, and when the private soldier commits a crime exactly like it he must go to the gallows.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator has referred to what he called my evidences of risibility at that point. It was this; and it comes as humor always comes, by a fault in logic. The Senator had been condemning Army officers as judges in courts-martial, and then he cited an instance where those very officers condemned one of their own brother officers very seriously; and when I called his attention to the fact that this board was made up of officers, I think it excited the risibilities of more than myself. So far as the Senator——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. My time is about out. The officers acquitted the officer of murder, but they found to be true specifications that constitute murder. The specifications, as found by the court-martial, showed him to be guilty of murder, and he was acquitted; whereas they convicted a private soldier of murder and he was hanged for an exactly similar offense. That is the difference. Now, let the Senator make the most of that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I will just say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the pending resolution go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the table, retaining its place.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ISLE OF PINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are two other resolutions coming over from a previous day, and if no order is made they will go to the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that they may also go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the following resolution——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. One of them is some inquiry about Cuba, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the Senator from Tennessee is willing that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

Mr. CARMACK. I had thought of asking for the consideration of the resolution, but the Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the committee, thinks it better that it should be referred, and has told me that the committee would give it attention.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We will take it up promptly.

Mr. CARMACK. I think that is a better course, and I am willing that the resolution shall go to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee relating to the Isle of Pines will go to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

SAFETY APPLIANCES ON RAILROADS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other resolution was also offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], directing the Interstate Commerce Commission "to send to the Senate copies of all petitions and arguments made to it for and against extension of time in which common carriers by railroad should comply with the act approved March 2, 1893, to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads," etc.

Mr. CARMACK. I wanted to have the consideration of that resolution by the Senate, but as I have neglected to put in writing the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I should like to have the resolution go over until to-morrow, when I will bring in an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the table, retaining its place.

Mr. CARMACK. I believe I will simply ask the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which meets to-morrow, and we can then consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16567) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, to report it with amendments. I will submit a written report later. I give notice that I will ask its consideration at the earliest possible moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote on this bill and the pending amendments be taken on the 16th of February, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I regret that I can not accede——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will allow the Chair to state the request. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the vote on the pending bill and any amendments that may then be offered or be then pending be voted on on the afternoon of February 16.

Mr. QUAY. At 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I regret that I can not consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The bill is before the Senate. The Senator from Masssachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to call up a little bill? It is unobjected to, and I should like to have it passed.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts yields to the Senator from South Carolina.

WILLIAM E. ANDERSON.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 11858) for the relief of William E. Anderson.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to so amend the military record of William E. Anderson, Company H, Third United States Artillery, as to show him honorably discharged to date June 18, 1847. But no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN MONEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying notes from the Mexican ambassador and the Chinese chargé d'affaires ad interim, which seek the cooperation of the Government of the United States in such measures as will tend to restore and maintain a fixed relationship between the moneys of the gold-standard countries and the silver-using countries.

I recommend that the Executive be given sufficient powers to lend the support of the United States in such manner and to such degree as he may deem expedient to the purposes of the two Governments.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1903.

Mr. ALDRICH. The communications from the representatives of the Chinese Government and the Mexican Government are not long, and I ask that they may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks for the reading of the papers. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORAKER. That is, the unfinished business is only temporarily laid aside.

Mr. ALDRICH. It will not take long.

The Secretary proceeded to read the papers.

Mr. FORAKER. I take it that these are papers which will be referred to the Committee on Finance. Would it not be satisfactory to the Senator from Rhode Island to have them printed in the RECORD and referred without reading?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to that course. I suggest that they be printed in the RECORD, and be printed separately, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the papers be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The message and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed.

The papers referred to are as follows:

THE PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to submit herewith a translation of a note from the ambassador of the Republic of Mexico and a copy of a note from the chargé d'affaires of the Imperial Chinese Government. Both notes ask the cooperation of the Government of the United States in such measures as will tend to restore and maintain a fixed relationship between the moneys of the gold-standard countries and the silver-using countries. It is not asked that the United States modify its monetary system, and it is distinctly disavowed that any movement is contemplated for the restoration of international bimetallism. The opinion is expressed, however, by the representatives of both Governments that consultation between the United States and European powers having dependencies in the Orient and the independent countries where silver money is in general use may result in the adoption of a monetary system which will prevent the great fluctuations in exchange which now occur in trade with the silver-using countries. If such a result can be achieved—and it is pointed out that at least a partial solution has been proposed in the United States in a bill now pending in the Senate in regard to the Philippine Islands—great benefits will follow to the trade of the world by making easier the access of the products of the manufacturing nations to the markets of China and the other silver-using countries.

The consideration of this subject may have an important bearing also on the payment of the indemnity due by China to certain European powers and to the United States, by enabling the Chinese Empire to put her monetary system upon a basis which will make it possible for her to meet these payments in a manner satisfactory to all the powers. This result, if it could be accomplished, would be of the first importance, not only to the United States and to the other powers having a share in the indemnity payments, but to China herself and her future development.

I respectfully submit for your consideration that these communications be transmitted to Congress with the recommendation that the Executive be given sufficient powers to lend the support of the United States, in such manner and to such degree as you may deem expedient, to the purposes of the two Governments whose notes are herewith submitted.

Respectfully submitted.

No. 323.] EMBASSY OF MEXICO, WASHINGTON, D. C.,
Washington, January 15, 1903.

EXCELLENCY: Referring to the interview which I had with you on the 20th day of December last, and to the suggestion of the secretary of foreign relations of my Government contained in the telegram of which I then had the honor to deliver to you a copy, to the effect that my Government would present to that of your excellency a plan for the utilization of the monetary systems of the nations which at the present time employ silver as current money, I have received from the secretary of foreign relations the necessary instructions to set forth the ideas of my Government in regard to the adoption of a plan by the United States and others of the governments which are most interested in this question. These ideas will be found expressed in the memorandum which accompanies this note.

The Government of Mexico would be gratified to obtain the cooperation of the United States in this matter in the manner which it may deem most appropriate and hopes with the deepest concern that its suggestions may merit especial consideration on the part of your excellency's Government.

I take pleasure, etc.,

MEMORANDUM.

The serious dangers which are threatened by the recent fluctuations in the value of silver bullion to the commerce both of gold and silver standard countries have determined the Government of the Republic of Mexico to ask the cooperation of the United States in seeking a remedy for these conditions. Safe and profitable trade between any two countries is dependent to a considerable degree upon relative stability in the value of their currencies. This stability is destroyed in the trade between a gold-standard country, like the United States, and a silver country, like Mexico, when the variations in the gold value of silver, as was the case during the year 1902, reach nearly 10 cents an ounce in gold in a single year, or nearly twenty per cent upon the price of silver bullion.

The problem of securing relative stability of exchange between the gold and silver countries is one whose importance is not limited to silver countries, but comes home with force to all those gold-standard countries which are seeking markets for their products in silver countries and are seeking the extension of their trade in the Orient. The importance of this trade is indicated in some measure by the following tables of the imports into certain silver-using countries for the latest year for which data is obtainable, based in some cases upon official figures and in others upon those presented in the Statesman's Yearbook for the year 1902, reduced to round figures in American gold coins:

Imports of certain silver-using countries.

China	$196,934,342	Korea	$5,500,000
Mexico	65,083,451	Bolivia	3,300,000
Philippine Islands	32,141,842	Colombia	11,083,028
The Straits Settlements	150,000,000	Guatemala	1,521,900
Federated Malay States	18,000,000	Honduras	1,074,050
Indo-China	35,750,000	Nicaragua	3,500,000
Cochin China	24,000,000	Paraguay	1,898,710
Tonking	12,300,000
Siam	12,600,000	Total	574,627,323

This large volume of imports into the silver countries, exceeding the entire annual import trade of the United States as recently as 1879, comes almost exclusively from the gold-standard countries which are engaged in the manufacture of finished goods for the world's markets and are profoundly interested in the extension of those markets. The table given does not include British India and several silver countries in South America who might become parties to an arrangement for giving stability to the relative value of the money of gold and silver countries.

The volume of exports from the gold-standard to the silver-standard countries is threatened not only by the uncertainly introduced into all transactions, but by the barrier of constantly rising silver prices for foreign goods in the silver countries. Thus, the Republic of Mexico, with the strongest desire to promote a large reciprocal trade with the United States, has not been able to prevent the automatic influence of the rise in silver prices of American goods from acting as a sort of progressive protection against their introduction into Mexico. Recent action by the Government of Mexico, compelled by the necessity of preserving a sufficient revenue for meeting its gold obligations abroad, has placed the import tariff itself upon a sliding scale, which will increase the burden of the silver charges upon merchandise imported from gold countries.

In another respect than the exports to silver countries the trade of the gold countries is threatened by the fluctuations in the value of silver. Silver is a by-product in the production of gold, copper, and lead, articles which constitute a large proportion of the annual mineral production of Mexico and the United States and form in both countries important articles of export. From the United States, according to official returns, the exports of copper ingots, bars, etc., for the fiscal year 1902 reached 288,720,655 pounds, of a reported value of $39,190,619, and the net exports of silver were about $21,500,000. These two items, exceeding $60,000,000, constitute nearly 5 per cent of the total exports of the United States. It is obvious that if silver, as one of the two products of a given operation, falls greatly in value, it must depress the net price received for both products and thereby diminish the profits and the output of the gold, copper, and lead industries of the United States and the value of such products when exported. From Mexico nearly half of the annual exports are of silver, which makes it still more important to her, from a commercial as well as a monetary point of view, that steps should be taken to check the recent fluctuations in the relative value of the money metals.

The large investments of the money of citizens of the United States in railways, mines, coffee plantations, smelting works, and many other enterprises in Mexico, exceeding in amount $500,000,000 gold, according to the last statement of your consul-general, Mr. Andrew Barlow, make the stability of relationship between the moneys of the two countries of direct importance to the United States. The earnings of these enterprises, remitted to American investors, have suffered a serious fall in gold value with every fall in the value of Mexican money, and the principal of the investment has suffered in the same manner when considered from the standpoint of converting it back into gold. It would act at once as a safeguard to existing investments and a stimulus toward their increase, with obvious benefits to both countries, if the money of Mexico could be brought into a stable relation to the money of the United States.

It is not advisable, in the opinion of this Government, that the Republic of Mexico should, under the present circumstances, adopt a pure gold currency, and it desires that some other system might be devised, with the concurrence of other powers, which will give stability of relationship to the money of the gold and silver using countries. The adoption by Mexico of a gold currency would cause the continued depreciation of an article which constitutes nearly one-half of her exports and would impose a seriously increased demand upon the gold stock of the world. The scale of wages and prices and the habits of the Mexican people are not well adapted to the introduction of gold coin as the principal medium of circulation. The same may be said of the conditions and the people of the Philippine Islands, which are under the authority of the United States; of the Straits Settlements and the Federated Malay States, which are under the authority of Great Britain; of Indo-China, Cochin China, and Tonking, which are under the authority or protection of France; of Formosa, which is under the authority of Japan, and of Siam, Korea, and China. Even if it were practicable for Mexico to adopt a gold currency for herself her action would represent but an incomplete and unsatisfactory solution of the problem of the exchanges, because it would not contribute in any appreciable degree toward the solution of the same problem in the countries of the Orient.

It will be noted that the largest volume of imports in the table given above is credited to the Chinese Empire. This large volume of trade, in order to obtain which great military and economic sacrifices have been made by the United States and European powers, is threatened in the present state of the Chinese fiscal and currency systems with partial paralysis, if not with extinction. The heavy indemnity imposed by certain of the powers upon the Chinese Government has led to large offerings of silver on the Chinese market, and has diminished the power of that country to purchase foreign goods to a point which threatens to materially reduce the existing export trade to China from the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, and other countries.

It is with a view to finding a remedy for these conditions, which will preserve the export and carrying trade of the leading manufacturing nations to the silver countries, that the cooperation of the United States is asked in representations to other leading powers in favor of international concert of action on this subject. The Government of Mexico does not seek the restoration of the free coinage of silver by either the gold or silver using nations, and does not ask the United States to modify her present monetary standard. It is recognized by this Government that bimetallism, in the sense of the free coinage of both metals, is a policy which has been definitely discarded by leading powers of Europe and by the United States and that it would be futile to ask its restoration.

It is, therefore, not the expectation nor the wish of this Government that the gold-standard countries should take any action tending to impair their monetary standard or to make material changes in their monetary systems. It is desired that the Governments of gold countries having dependencies where silver is used and the Governments of silver countries shall cooperate in formulating some plan for establishing a definite relationship between their gold and silver moneys and shall take proper measures to maintain such relationship. One such plan has already been proposed in both Houses of the Congress of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands. It is this and other plans designed to accomplish the same end which the Government of Mexico would be glad to have considered by the United States and other Governments with the view to the adoption of the best attainable monetary arrangement by those countries which are not prepared under existing conditions to adopt a currency system involving the general use of gold coins.

The cooperation of the United States with the Republic of Mexico in presenting this subject to other governments would, in the opinion of the latter, aid greatly in securing a prompt and satisfactory solution of an economic problem which threatens the ruin of the silver-using countries on the one hand, in the vain effort to meet increasing gold obligations abroad, and which threatens also the commercial prosperity of the gold-using countries by destroying the purchasing power of their customers. It seems that it would contribute materially to the permanent and satisfactory settlement of this problem if Great Britain and France, with their important colonial possessions in Asia, and if Germany, Russia, and other countries having large commercial and territorial interests there, would unite with the United States and Mexico in the adoption of a common standard for a new coinage system in the silver countries; in recommendations for the readjustment of the fiscal and monetary relations of China with the other powers which would permit that country to continue to be a user of silver and a purchaser of the products of the manufacturing nations; and in such provision for their own subsidiary currencies as would tend to promote stability of relationship between their gold and silver money.

Mr. Shen to Mr. Hay.

No. 276.] CHINESE LEGATION,
Washington, January 19, 1903.

SIR: I have the honor to state that on the 26th December last I received a telegram from the Imperial Government giving me instructions relative to a proposed international discussion of the silver question.

The steady depreciation and constant fluctuation in the value of silver in recent years in particular not only prove detrimental to the interests of China, which is one of the silver-standard nations, but, it is believed, seriously affect in no small degree the export trade of the United States and European nations with silver-using countries. With a view to further the interests of all concerned, it is now proposed that the Chinese Government, acting in concert with the Government of the Mexican Republic, request the cooperation of the Government of the United States in representations to other leading powers in favor of international concert of action relative to the silver question.

It will be my pleasurable duty in the immediate future to submit to you for the consideration of your Government a memorandum embodying the views of my Government bearing upon this subject in greater detail.

Accept, sir, etc.,

SHEN TUNG,
First Secretary and Chargé d'Affaires ad interim.

Mr. Shen to Mr. Hay.

No. 277.] CHINESE LEGATION,
Washington, January 22, 1903.

SIR: Referring to my note (No. 276) of the 19th instant, in which I informed you that I had received instructions from the Imperial Government relative to a proposed plan looking toward an international concert of action bearing upon the monetary question, I have the honor to submit to you the accompanying memorandum containing the views of my Government relating to the above-mentioned subject.

It is the confident hope of the Imperial Government that the subject-matter of its memorandum may receive the careful consideration of the Government of the United States and that such steps may be taken as it may deem proper toward bringing about the desired end, to the mutual benefit of all concerned.

Accept, sir, etc.,

SHEN TUNG.

MEMORANDUM.

The serious results which are threatened by the recent fluctuations in the value of silver bullion to the commerce both of gold and silver standard countries have induced the Chinese Imperial Government, acting in concert with the Mexican Government, to ask the cooperation of the United States in seeking a remedy for these conditions for the mutual benefit of all concerned. Safe and profitable trade between any two countries is dependent to a considerable degree upon relative stability in the value of their currencies. This stability is destroyed in the trade between a gold-standard country like the United States and a silver country like China when the variations in the gold value of silver, as was the case during the year 1902, reached nearly 10 cents an ounce in gold in a single year, or nearly 20 per cent upon the price of silver bullion.

The problem of securing relative stability of exchange between the gold and silver countries is one whose importance is not limited to silver countries, but comes home with force to all those gold-standard countries which are seeking markets for their products in silver countries and are seeking the extension of their trade in the Orient. The importance of this trade is indicated in some measure by the following table of the imports into certain silver-using countries for the latest year for which data are obtainable, based in some cases upon official figures and in others upon those presented in the Statesman's Year Book for the year 1902, reduced to round figures in American gold coin:

Imports of certain silver-using countries.

China	$196,934,342	Korea	$5,500,000
Mexico	65,083,451	Bolivia	3,300,000
Philippine Islands	32,141,842	Colombia	11,084,026
The Straits Settlements	150,000,000	Guatemala	1,521,900
Federated Malay States	18,000,000	Honduras	1,074,050
Indo-China	35,750,000	Nicaragua	3,500,000
Cochin China	24,000,000	Paraguay	1,838,710
Tonkin	12,360,000
Siam	12,600,000	Total	574,627,323

This large volume of imports into the silver countries, exceeding the entire annual import trade of the United States as recently as 1879, comes almost exclusively from the gold-standard countries which are engaged in the manufacture of finished goods for the world's markets, and are profoundly interested in the extension of those markets. The table given does not include British India and several silver countries in South America which might become parties to an engagement for giving stability to the relative value of the money of gold and silver countries.

It will be noted that the largest amount of imports in the table given above is credited to the Chinese Empire. This large volume of trade is threatened in the present state of the Chinese fiscal and currency systems with a decline, the limit of which no one could foresee. The heavy indemnity imposed by certain of the powers upon the Chinese Government has led to large offerings of silver on the Chinese market, and has diminished the power of that country to purchase foreign goods to a point which threatens to materially reduce the existing export trade to China from the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, and other countries.

The foreign trade of China, while standing at the head of the above table in the order of magnitude, is small at present in proportion to the population and resources of the Chinese Empire. The exports from the United States to China have multiplied manifold within twelve years and now exceed $24,000,000. The present volume of imports of merchandise into China, however, amounts to only about 50 cents per capita in gold, and affords but a slight measure of what the trade of China might become if expanded in the future as rapidly as even that of Japan, which has advanced in ten years from about $1.25 to nearly $3 per capita. An import trade of $3 per capita for the Empire of China with its nearly 400,000,000 people, would represent the enormous sum of $1,200,000,000, or one-third more than the largest amount ever attained by the import trade of the United States. The encouragement of a commerce so important as this seems to the Chinese Imperial Government to be worthy of the most serious consideration of the Western powers. It would afford an outlet for the produce of the labor of many thousands of workers of Europe and America, and employment for many millions of the capital of those nations, and would dot the Pacific and Indian oceans with the flags of a carrying trade as large as that now required in the entire commerce between Europe and the United States.

While a readjustment of the currency of China upon a stable relationship with that of the gold-standard countries would not in itself, perhaps, accomplish so tremendous a revolution as would be involved in the creation of a trade of more than a thousand millions, yet it would be one of several steps in that direction which would contribute greatly to accelerate an event of such paramount importance to the capitalists and the producing masses of the Old and New Worlds. The necessity is becoming more and more keenly felt by American and European manufacturers for the opening of new and the extension of already existing markets in every direction for the absorption of their goods in order that means may be found for relieving overproduction and affording profitable returns to the investment of capital. China, with her immense population and consequently large potential capacity for absorbing foreign products, offers a most important field for American and European manufactures, the ready absorption of which would tend to relieve overproduction and contribute materially to the prosperity of the manufacturing nations.

If results such as these are within the range of the influence of a reorganization of the monetary system of China in harmony with the system of other powers where silver is the principal money in use, it is evident that the Chinese Imperial Government acts from no narrow and selfish motive in asking the United States and the Republic of Mexico to join her in seeking an international arrangement for securing greater fixity of relationship between the moneys of the gold and silver countries.

Questions of finance and economics should be considered in all their bearings, with due attention to their far-reaching effects and not merely upon results which bring immediate benefit. Important as are the indemnity payments to the several powers, and ready as China is to meet them to the best of her ability, they represent but a trifling proportion of the benefits which may be derived by the Western powers from a policy which would give to China a permanent, uniform monetary system and make her a wide market for the products of American and European factories and workshops.

It is with a view to finding a remedy for the monetary causes which threaten to retard this development, and to preserve the export and carrying trade of the leading manufacturing nations to the silver countries, so that trade may not lose its healthy activity and confidence may be restored to investors and manufacturers, that the cooperation of the United States is asked in representations to other leading powers in favor of international concert of action on this subject. The Government of China does not seek the restoration of the free coinage of silver by either the gold or silver using nations. It is recognized by this Government that bimetallism, in the sense of the free coinage of both metals, is a policy which has been definitely discarded by leading powers of Europe and by the United States, and that it would be futile to propose its restoration.

It is, therefore, not the expectation nor the wish of this Government that the gold-standard countries should take any action tending to impair their monetary standard or make material changes in their monetary systems. It is desired that the governments of gold countries having dependencies where silver is used and the governments of silver countries shall cooperate in formulating some plan for establishing a definite relationship between their gold and silver moneys and shall take proper measures to maintain such relationship. One such plan, it is reported, has already been proposed in both Houses of the Congress of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands. It is this and other plans designed to accomplish the same end which the Government of China would be glad to have considered by the United States and other governments with the view to the adoption of the best attainable monetary arrangement by those countries which are not prepared under existing conditions to adopt a currency system involving the general use of gold coins.

The cooperation of the United States with the Chinese Imperial Government and with the Republic of Mexico in presenting this subject to other governments would, in the opinion of this Government, aid greatly in securing a prompt and satisfactory solution of an economic problem which threatens the ruin of the silver-using countries on the one hand in the vain effort to meet increasing gold obligations abroad, and which threatens also the commercial prosperity of the gold-using countries by destroying the purchasing power of their customers. It would, we believe, contribute materially to the permanent satisfactory settlement of this problem if Great Britain and France, with their important colonial possessions in Asia, and if Germany and Russia and other countries having large commercial and territorial interests there would unite with the United States and China in the adoption of a common standard for a new coinage system in the silver countries, in recommendations for the readjustment of the fiscal and monetary relations of China with the other powers which would permit that country to continue to be a user of silver and a purchaser of the products of the manufacturing nations, and in such provision for their own subsidiary currencies as would tend to promote stability of relationship between their gold and silver money. The Chinese Imperial Government will welcome the cooperation of the United States in this matter in any form which may be acceptable to that power, and earnestly prays that the subject may receive the prompt and serious consideration which, in the opinion of this Government, it merits.

CLAIMS AGAINST COLOMBIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

Referring to Senate Document No. 264, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in the claim of Messrs. George A. Tarler & Co. against the Government of Colombia, which were inadvertently omitted from the papers sent to the Senate on March 20, 1902, in response to the Senate's resolution of March 15, 1900.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 29, 1903.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was discussing yesterday, when I yielded the floor, the question of population as one of the necessary conditions of the admission of Territories to statehood. I laid down the proposition that a too small population was an objection; that theoretically we ought to have a population corresponding to the proportion which the Constitution required when our total population was 4,000,000, and which would make the requisite population of a new State now a million and a half. I also laid down the further proposition that of course it would be absurd to attempt to enforce any such rule as that rigidly; that the numbers we require in the admission of any Territory to statehood must be a subject of discretion, upon which we must pass not only with a view to the actual population, but with a view to the probable population which the State could sustain or would be likely to gather in the future.

Now, Mr. President, I will pass from the first proposition that a sufficient population must be one of the conditions of statehood and come to what seems to me to be the second test. We have a right to ask not only whether the State has sufficient population at the time or a sufficient prospect of population in the future to entitle it to admission to statehood, but we also have the right to ask that that population should be of a proper quality.

This is a matter of very great importance. The quality of our citizenship, as I have already pointed out, is something which we undertake to guard both in the immigration and in the naturalization laws, and it certainly ought to be guarded in any law which admits an entire community to citizenship in the United States. We have a right to ask of any Territory seeking admittance as a State to the Union whether their population is American, whether it is imbued with American ideas, attached to American institutions, whether it speaks our common language, and possesses all the other attributes which we consider to be typical of an American community.

The third test which it seems to me we have a right to apply is, whether the Territory presents those conditions which will insure a population such as any State in this Union ought ultimately to have. The population of the different States ought not to be too widely different in numbers. It is not well to have one State with a population of 7,000,000 represented in this Senate with two Senators and a State with a population of 100,000 or a few hundred thousand with an equal representation. It is desirable that disparities of that kind should be as few as possible. While it is not necessary to require that a State should have at the moment of admission a million or a million and a half of citizens, it is fair to ask if it presents these natural conditions which will enable it in the process of time to acquire a population sufficient to put it on a due equality with the other States of the Union.

Now, Mr. President, in this connection I wish to examine briefly what constitutes a State. Of course the people primarily are what constitutes it, but on what are States built and in what way is population gathered in any given region or area of country? Primarily agriculture. Where we know that a State has agricultural lands, great regions suitable for the operations of agriculture, we may confidently assert that if it has not the population proper to a great State at the moment it is certain to attain to it, and all our history and the history of all our States shows that to be the case.

But we must inquire a little further than this. A State can not be built on prophecies and predictions and prospects. It must present the actual material qualities which insure the necessary population and which qualify it to take its place in the great commonwealth of States.

Agriculture, as I have said, is the first of those conditions. We have a right to inquire whether the agricultural lands are sufficient to insure the population which we are entitled ultimately to demand of any State. But agriculture is not the only thing that makes a State. Manufactures also do it. Large populations can be gathered by manufacturing industries and States built up in that way. But manufactures likewise require certain conditions for success. Most of our manufactures started on the possession by the region where they were founded of water power. There is also necessary for the successful prosecution of manufactures neighborhood to markets and to the sources of the raw material used. The growth of manufactures, however, under the best circumstances and with the greatest natural advantages, is comparatively slow. They can not be built up with the rapidity with which a country can be opened to farming. Therefore, even if a region of territory offers all the qualifications necessary for manufactures, we have to make due allowance for the time required to gather together a manufacturing population.

Another element in State building is commerce. Commerce demands primarily the ocean; if it is an inland region there must be rivers and inland waterways. We must inquire, and we have a right to inquire, into all those points when we are deciding about the fitness of any given region for admission as a State into the Union. The consideration of the rivers and the waterways, of course, will indicate whether the State is well adapted for distributing points and for trade routes. This is a matter of the first importance when we come to consider the question of the accumulation and increase of population. A State in a region ill adapted for trade routes is easily made eccentric; that is, it is easily thrown out of the great lines of traffic and of commerce, and thus remains eccentric because it never meets the line which commerce takes—almost invariably the line of least resistance.

Mr. President, I have pointed out roughly some of the qualifications which are necessary for the upbuilding of a State and for gathering a suitable population—adaptability to agriculture, to manufactures, or to commerce. A State which has the conditions necessary for any one, or for all of these, may safely be admitted with the certainty that only time, more or less limited, will be needed to bring an ample population within its borders, but a State which does not possess any of these qualifications at once presents the grave danger that we are making a State and giving to it all the powers which a State has under our system, without any reasonable prospect that it will ever acquire the population which every State of this Union should have, if we are not to present too violent a contrast between the power of population and the arbitrary power of certain areas of territory known as States.

In two of the Territories which it is proposed by this bill to admit as States, the great industry—practically the only industry of any importance—is mining. And I wish to examine the matter of mines and mining briefly, with a view to determining, so far as we may, whether in mines and mining we find an assurance of a great and stable population. In the two Territories to which I refer this is a question of the very first importance. Their agricultural lands are exceedingly limited. They may be increased by irrigation. But that is a speculation of the future, and you can not found a State on the hope of the eager people who want to have it admitted as a State. Their grazing lands are limited, according to the testimony, to a region of about 5 miles on each side of their rivers. Their rivers are comparatively few, of uncertain depth and volume, often very dry. They present, so far as I can learn from the testimony, but slight prospect of furnishing the water power which lies at the basis of manufacture.

Therefore, Mr. President, in discussing the possibility of those Territories becoming suitable States of the Union in point of population, it is necessary to look very closely at that which constitutes the only large source of their wealth to-day. That wealth is drawn from mines; chiefly, so far as I can judge, from mines of the precious metals, though there are large and very valuable mines of copper in one of them.

Now, as to the wealth of States founded on the wealth of mines, it may be laid down as a general proposition that great populations can be assembled by mines and their products only when you can combine the product of the mine with the product of the factory, when you have your iron and your coal near together, and when the manufacturer can follow hard upon the footsteps of the miner. If that condition exists, you can produce such a region as the coal and iron districts of England or of Pennsylvania or of Alabama. There you have the baser metal, together with coal, in such large and convenient quantities and so near to each other that they present at once the most inviting of opportunities for manufacture, and you can build up a lasting population and a large population in that way. But Arizona and New Mexico are Territories chiefly distinguished for the precious metals, for silver or for gold.

There can be no doubt, Mr. President, I think, in the mind of anyone who will take the trouble to examine history, that no great population has ever been assembled, no great cities have ever been built, near mines of the precious metals. If you will go back to the beginning, to the earliest period of recorded history, and take the history of Egypt, so far as we can discover it from the inscriptions and records which remain, you will learn that the copper mines of Maghara, which were on the other side of the Red Sea, were one of the great sources of the wealth and the development of Egypt. But Egypt did not grow up in the neighborhood of the Maghara copper mines. The population and the wealth of Egypt, the great cities, and the mighty trade all were in the valley of the Nile.

In the same way recent discoveries have disclosed to us the fact that there were gold mines in Rhodesia, where at the present day the world is again taking out large quantities of gold. Old workings have been discovered there which indicate that at least £150,000,000 of gold were taken from the mines in Rhodesia. It is believed that gold was carried by the Phœnicians to Arabia, and thence it passed into Egypt. There are the remains of ruined cities in the neighborhood of those gold mines; but the significant fact is that there have as yet been discovered scarcely any cemeteries and scarcely any skeletons indicating a permanent population, a place where people lived and died and stayed and buried their dead. The indications are that the dead were carried away to the countries to which they belonged, and that these cities, the ruins of which still remain, were constructed solely for the temporary population which went there to exploit the mines. The wealth and the population did not stay by the mines, but went to Egypt. It was along the valley of the Nile that the great population sprang up.

Look again at the history of Greece. There is no doubt that the strength of Alexander the Great and the strength of Greece, in earlier times, the financial and economic strength, was largely drawn from what was known as the golden Chersonese. It was the opening of the mines in the neighborhood of the Black Sea which led to the upbuilding of the Grecian system. The old fable of Jason and his Argonauts and of the Golden Fleece is simply the story in poetic form of the movement of the Greek people into the gold-mining regions of the Caucasus and of the Black Sea. But the great cities of Greece, the wealth, the strength, the population, were in Greece itself, on the borders of Asia Minor, in Sicily, and in Magna Græcia; that is, the precious metals were drawn from the mines, but the people, the towns, the civilization, grew up in the neighborhood of the ocean, on the great trade routes, in agricultural regions, and not where the precious metals were found and dug up and brought to market.

It was very much the same way in the Roman days. They drew their metallic wealth largely from Spain; but the great population—although there were many large cities in Spain which commerce and industry had built—the great population of the Roman Empire and of the ruling race was concentrated in Italy, where there were no gold mines.

When the center of exchange passed from the Adriatic to Holland, when the East was opened and gold from the East was brought to Europe, it was where the gold was brought, and not where it was mined, that great cities sprang up and great populations gathered.

If you bring the question down to more specific cases you will find everywhere that that which has determined the growth of population has been the trade routes, commerce, industry, and never the mere presence of mines. Men will dig the precious metals from the earth and carry them away to some other place. There are towns in this new country of ours, once filled with the flourishing habitations of men, and with a numerous population, which are to-day extinct. The earth ceased to yield its precious metals and population departed. You can found a population on agriculture; you can found it on commerce; you can found it on the baser metals lying ready for manufacture; you can found it on manufacture, on great rivers and great waterways, but the world has never seen any great permanent population in the neighborhood of the mines of the precious metals or the precious stones, and it never will.

In considering a State you therefore must look at the more enduring qualifications. The most enduring of all is agriculture, the industry which takes the annual increase of the earth and which never destroys that which yields it its living and its hope. You can take manufactures and plant them along the streams, and the streams will ever give them the water power. You can build a State on anything where Nature, with her kindly hand, will from year to year restore the loss you create, but you can not build a State on the precious metals alone. It is of no more consequence with the view to the future of the State whether it has precious metals than whether it has them not, because the population that it brings is absolutely evanescent and passing.

Now, having laid down the tests which it seems to me ought to be applied to the decision as to what natural qualifications a Territory ought to possess, I wish to apply those tests to the Territories now under consideration. I will not detain the Senate by a discussion of Oklahoma. It must be obvious to everyone that that Territory is fit to come into the Union—fitted in population, fitted in the character of its population, and fitted by its natural qualifications and by the reasonable prospects of growth and permanent prosperity which those natural qualifications insure. I believe myself that with Oklahoma should come ultimately or at this moment the Indian Territory. I do not think that any division should be made in that region, especially as the Indian Territory is the natural complement in its natural resources of what is now the Territory of Oklahoma. These Territories have the population and all the other qualifications of which I have spoken. I shall not, therefore, waste time in discussing before the Senate the qualifications of a Territory which seem to me conclusive as to its right to admission.

The two Territories of which I wish to speak are New Mexico and Arizona. I will take New Mexico first. I stated yesterday that I began by objecting to its name. I do not think it is intelligent; I do not think it is proper, in fact, to give a State of the American Union the name of an adjoining country. It seems to me that it should have a decisively American name. It is true that the name is to be left to the decision of the convention; but in a case like this it seems to me it is safer that Congress should decide. I do not want to have the inhabitants of any State of the American Union known as Mexicans or New Mexicans. I think it is better to separate them entirely, even in name, from another country, and especially when that country adjoins our own.

It is continually used as an argument that New Mexico has been kept out of the Union for fifty years. The argument is made that because she has been kept out of the Union for half a century therefore she ought to be admitted now. The fact that New Mexico has been kept out for fifty years is the strongest possible argument against her present admission. She has not been kept out for fifty years by accident; she has been kept out for fifty years because in the judgment of the American Congress and of the American people in all that time she has not shown a fitness to come in.

This is not keeping out an unoccupied or sparsely populated Territory. New Mexico had 60,000 people when she was organized as a Territory, and in all these fifty years those 60,000 people and their descendants have never been able to satisfy the American Congress or the American people that they had fitted themselves to become a part of American citizenship and of the great commonwealth of States. In all those fifty years they have developed no agriculture, which is the great basis of States. I do not mean absolutely none, of course, but I mean none in comparison to the extent of the Territory or to what we should expect from a region that started with a population of 60,000.

On that point nothing could be more striking than the difference between New Mexico and Oklahoma. New Mexico, starting with a population of 60,000, has remained with a comparatively small population, with but a slight increase in agriculture, and with but a slight increase in industry. Oklahoma, opened only the other day to settlement, has got more than half a million people, perhaps nearly a million people, to-day, and is covered with towns, developing and growing in every direction. I do not attribute all this to the difference in the races which inhabit these two Territories. It shows a difference in race and in race energy, it is true, but it also shows that there was no such opportunity in New Mexico as in Oklahoma. Open a region like Oklahoma to settlement and it populates at once. New Mexico has been opened for fifty years and its increase has been trifling. Oklahoma in a few years has rushed up to a population sufficient almost for any State, and New Mexico in fifty years has climbed painfully to 195,000, all told.

The reason of this slow growth and of this continued exclusion is to be found in the history of the Territory itself. I have no desire to go into details. I am stating only the general facts, known to everyone. New Mexico came to us with a Spanish-speaking population of Spanish descent, and a Spanish-speaking population they have remained. They came to us without any school system—and I esteem a school system one of the most typical of all American qualities—and they never even began a public-school system until 1889. Think of that, Mr. President! We obtained New Mexico by treaty in 1848; we organized her as a Territory in 1850. Then forty years elapsed before they passed a law providing for a public-school system.

Mr. President, the handful of men who gathered on the edge of the wilderness in New England when the first landing of any considerable number was made, in 1629 and 1630, had by 1636 not only founded a school system, but they had even gone so far as to found a university. They were utterly detached from the world, with no communication with the outside world except by a long voyage over a stormy ocean, and yet in that brief period they had laid the foundations of popular education and of higher education as well. When the people of New Mexico were taken into the possession of the Union they were a long-settled race. They had been there for many generations. They were brought within the scope of American influences, and yet they waited forty years before they founded a school system.

That system is already beginning to produce beneficial effects. More people are speaking English, fewer are speaking Spanish; but the Spanish still remains in large degree the language of the mass of the population, the language of the children, the language of the juries. They are obliged to have interpreters in their courts; they are compelled to print their laws in Spanish; they must have interpreters in their political conventions. To my mind, Mr. President, that is a very serious objection. I have no prejudice in the world against the Spanish language. It is a great, a noble speech; but that is not the question. It is not here a question of the comparative value of languages. It is a question of having a homogeneous people within the borders of the United States, a people who are one in aspiration, in belief, in hopes, and in ideals. Mr. President, community of language is one of the greatest and one of the most important tests that can be applied in that direction.

We have here, therefore, a Territory which has been for more than fifty years a Territory, where the population has grown very slowly, where a foreign language is still the prevailing speech, where agriculture has not yet been developed, where the industries are confined to small farming on the edge of rivers and to grazing within a region of 5 miles on each side of the stream. I do not undertake to predict that in the future New Mexico may not have a population sufficient in number and of suitable quality to be an honor and a credit to the Union. My contention is that she has it not to-day, and it is with to-day that we are dealing.

I should like next to call attention to illiteracy. The illiteracy of New Mexico, according to the last census, was 33.2 per cent. I will not contrast that with any particular State, although I have made some comparisons in that direction, but that is more than three times the average illiteracy of the entire United States, including all our colored population, among whom the rate of illiteracy is very high in certain parts of the country. Yet the illiteracy of New Mexico is three times the average illiteracy of the United States. It seems to me we have a right to demand of a new State that the rate of illiteracy should approximate, at least, to that of the rest of the United States.

Mr. President, I shall ask leave to print the table which I have here. I do not wish to weary the Senate with these figures, but I shall ask leave to print it, as I have prepared it with some care in order to contrast the illiteracy of New Mexico with the illiteracy of certain States of the United States, and I have included Arizona in the same comparison.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the table will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my contention in regard to New Mexico is that although her population equals that of a single Congressional district she does not present a sufficient population in proportion to her territory; that she does not present a population suitable at present for American citizenship—I am speaking of it as a whole—and that she does not as yet present those conditions which would warrant the expectation of a sufficient population in the near future. To my mind those objections are fatal.

I know it is said that her population was not correctly returned, but, Mr. President, her population was returned according to the census of the United States. We have to act upon that census. My State and your State receive their members of Congress on the United States census. All the rights we have dependent upon numbers of population rest on the national census, and what is good for the rest of the country is good enough for these Territories, and there is nothing else that we can rest on anywhere.

That census gives New Mexico barely the population of a single Congressional district. That population, as I have shown, is still largely Spanish speaking. For only a little more than ten years—thirteen years, to be exact—has it had any public-school system. Its illiteracy is very high. There is no indication as yet in the natural conditions that there is going to be agriculture there, or manufactures or commerce upon which a great population will surely arise. Therefore, the argument is conclusive in my mind against admitting New Mexico at this time into the Union as a State.

I now pass to the other Territory—Arizona. I will take primarily the first test—the actual population. It is given in the census as 94,000. By adding the Indians I believe they have brought it up to 123,000. But the white population of Arizona is not over 94,000. There is a Spanish-speaking element there also, but not a large one.

But the most interesting fact about Arizona is in regard to illiteracy. As Arizona has approached the demand for statehood the illiteracy has increased and not decreased. The illiteracy in Arizona in 1880 constituted 17.7 per cent of the population; in 1890, 23.4 per cent, and in 1900 about 29 per cent. That is, the illiteracy of Arizona has been progressive. It is not yet as large a percentage as that of New Mexico, but it is nearly so, and at its present rate of progress it will pass it by the next census. In New Mexico it is fair to say that illiteracy is decreasing.

I think we have reason to pause and give very careful consideration before we decide to admit to citizenship in the United States a population in which illiteracy is on the increase. The population of Arizona is too small under any conditions for present admission, and it is a population with an increasing ratio of illiterates. That, in my mind, is conclusive as to its quality. It has not as yet shown any of the great material conditions necessary for the largest population. It has not as yet shown any great opportunities for agriculture, for manufacture, or for commerce. I know, of course, there is irrigation, and that it is said that when the land is irrigated it will be one vast garden. That may possibly be true; and when irrigation is a success, and a reasonable portion—I will not say all—of Arizona is a garden, no one will be more ready to admit it than I. But we can not admit States on the prospect of what they will do when they are irrigated and when irrigation becomes a success. We must judge them on what they are to-day. We can not admit States on the rosy visions of would-be Senators. We are not admitting Arizona as she may be possibly fifty years hence. It is proposed to admit her now. It is proposed to admit her to an equal share in the Senate of the United States, in the government of this country, in the settlement of our foreign relations, and in our electoral college. The question is, Is she fit for it now? I do not see any sign of fitness, with that small population, that increasing illiteracy, and with the great conditions under which a State alone can be built as yet wholly undeveloped.

Mr. President, I might go on and read testimony at great length from the admirable investigation made by the committee, but I do not think there is a single one of the general propositions I have laid down in regard to these two Southern Territories which can be successfully controverted. I do not wish to burden the RECORD or weary the Senate by reading to them page after page of testimony; but all the testimony demonstrates what I have said. I believe every word I have spoken is susceptible of absolute proof as to the numbers and quality of the population, the language spoken, the amount of illiteracy, the general material resources of the Territory at the present day, and the prospect of a suitable and sufficient population within any reasonable time. According to my view, neither Arizona nor New Mexico reaches in any degree the qualifications which I deem necessary for statehood, and which I should require for a State before I should willingly vote to admit it.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I feel constrained to oppose this bill. I think, as I said at the outset, that it is a very grave matter indeed—this admission of new States into the American Union. I do not think it ought to be done in this way. I do not think it ought to be done by omnibus bills. I think every State should come in on its own merits. I do not think a bill should be crowded through, with all amendments refused, in the hurried days of a short session, which involves the admission of six Senators into this body.

Mr. President, I do not think that this bill of all bills should have applied to it the unusual methods which are now applied, and which are still further threatened. I think to attempt to place this bill as an amendment upon an appropriation bill, which can only be done by an absolute disregard of the rules of the Senate and of every principle of parliamentary law, and by overruling the decision which any occupant of the chair would be obliged to make, can only recoil on those who promote such methods. Those who are in opposition and in a minority at the moment, may be in the majority to-morrow. It is well for those who are advocating these extreme measures in order to get this bill through, made up as it is of three wholly distinct propositions, to remember that if they adopt extreme measures they are establishing precedents which may return one day to plague them.

I can recall a time, Mr. President, before I had the honor of a seat in this body, when a measure, of which I had charge in the House, came over here, and Senators on the other side found in the rules their protection against what they considered very dangerous legislation. It is well for us to remember, Mr. President, that revolutionary precedents in legislation should not be made. It is in itself an argument against this measure that revolutionary methods, disregard of absolute rules, disregard of parliamentary law are thought necessary to urge it to a vote.

I think, Mr. President, that this is a bill which can not be too fully or too thoroughly discussed. There are many Senators who still desire to discuss it; the debate is far from being exhausted upon it, and we have a right to demand on a matter of this importance that the discussion shall proceed in ordinary and usual ways.

Mr. President, I have no desire, for one, and I have never had any desire, to enter on methods of obstruction. I do not think I ever took part in either House in any obstructive tactics. I do not mean to say they are never justified—I have just alluded to a case where Senators on the other side thought they were amply justified—but I do say that if it is ever justifiable to obstruct, if it is ever justifiable to bring an extra session upon the country and upon Congress, it is when it is proposed or suggested that general legislation embodied in a great bill of this character shall be driven through in the face of parliamentary law, in the face of our own rules, in the face of all precedents, by being attached to an appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I have said what I have to say upon this subject. I feel very strongly the unwisdom, the impolicy of admitting two of these Territories. I feel especially that it is most unwise and injudicious to pass in this way, under the cover of an omnibus bill, without the opportunity to amend it, an act which no succeeding Congress can ever repeal. When we take this step it is taken once and for all, and before the United States resigns its power over this Territory, Mr. President, which it acquired as the United States, I sincerely hope that the Senate will pause and will give every opportunity for a full discussion and for a thorough debate of what must ever be one of the most momentous propositions that can come before us. And when Senators decide, let them remember that they are not closing an account, but that we have other Territories and other possessions, that they are making a precedent for future Congresses, and that it lies with them not to make a precedent which may recoil upon them with tenfold force and bring in dangers to the State which no one now contemplates.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and attention to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], as I always do, because he is painstaking and is usually accurate, and he states his case with precision and in such a manner that no one can misunderstand him. I do not now intend to make a speech, nor do I at any other time, I think, in regard to the admission of these Territories.

But I submit to the Senate that the able Senator from Massachusetts insisted all through the argument that these Territories should be treated differently from any other Territories which have ever applied for admission to the Union. In every point he makes he insists that there should be, with regard to the admission of Arizona and New Mexico, an exception to the rule which has been established by long precedent. For instance, Congress has never, I think, changed the name of a Territory, and the bill before us provides that the constitutional convention of New Mexico, which will be held under the enabling act, may change the name of the Territory to some other name if they desire. It has been the custom of Congress always to allow incoming States to choose the names of their States. He laid great stress upon that.

Then it has been argued before the Senate in regard both to New Mexico and Arizona that the States should assume the indebtedness of some counties in the States. There is in this bill the same provision in regard to the debts of those Territories that there has been in bills for all the Territories heretofore admitted, which is that the State shall assume the indebtedness of the Territories.

Then he objects to an omnibus bill. Why did he not object to the omnibus bill which admitted North Dakota and South Dakota and Montana and Washington? There is a precedent which the Senator from Massachusetts did not object to establishing at the time the Senate passed the bill making a State of South Dakota and a Territory for North Dakota. That is right. The bill went to the House. The House passed a substitute making two States of Dakota, North and South Dakota, and a State of Washington and a State of Montana; and the Senate afterwards accepted that substitute, it having gone into conference.

The Senator says that no amendments are allowed. He says that Senators ought to be allowed to amend this bill. Why? When Idaho was admitted it was admitted by the Senate precisely as the bill came to the Senate from the House. Why? I was a Delegate in Congress at the time, and I was no more diligent than these Delegates are, I can assure you. I know from experience how anxious the Delegates are to give their Territories the great boon of statehood. I took advantage of all the other bills which had preceded, and framed a bill on such lines that, unless a departure was made from custom, there would be no necessity for amending the bill in the Senate. It is not a sign that the bill is faulty that we do not want to have the bill amended. We fear, and more so since this debate has commenced, that an amendment will defeat the bill. Having the opportunities which the Delegates have had for framing a bill directly in line with the bills which admitted all the other Territories, there is no necessity for an amendment. Very few suggestions of amendment have been made.

I point out these matters because the Senator from Massachusetts referred to them all and insisted that a departure from established custom and precedent should be made in regard to the admission of these Territories. It is the opinion of those most familiar with the Western country, those familiar with the resources of the arid regions, that both New Mexico and Arizona possess great opportunities in an agricultural way.

There is as much agricultural land in the Pecos Valley in New Mexico as there is land in the State of Massachusetts. There is more agricultural land susceptible of cultivation in each of these Territories than there is land in the State of Massachusetts. And in addition to that there is water sufficient to serve these lands.

I would say in addition that Congress in admitting Territories in the past has looked to the future and not to the present. Otherwise the State which I have the honor in part to represent here and the State of Wyoming would never have been States of this Union.

Idaho had but 80,000 population and a very few acres comparatively of lands in cultivation when we were admitted. We increased 100 per cent in population during the past ten years and 100 per cent over that in the last three years. It has brought capital there which has built great canals and opened up our country. It was being opened up slowly in Territorial days. Only the other day, as I said before, one tract of 271,000 acres of land was taken up in my State under the Carey Act by capitalists, and not only is the State getting the benefit of the act, but of the population which is coming in.

It will of necessity be the same in New Mexico and Arizona, because they have demonstrated that they can cultivate the arid lands in that country. Under the wise provision of the irrigation law which was passed at the last session of Congress, which puts into the irrigation fund a large sum of money for these purposes, the development in these Territories must of necessity be great and rapid.

As I said, I do not intend to make a speech. But the Senator from Massachusetts, notwithstanding his able argument, has contended on every point that an exception from the long-established rule and precedent must be made if you oppose the admission of these two Territories.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am quite willing to argue in favor of an exception if it is necessary. I do not think I put it quite as strongly as the Senator from Idaho has presented it, but I am perfectly willing to take the ground that if the manner and principles on which we have admitted States heretofore have been erroneous it is time to change them. The fact that we have been careless and reckless in admissions before seems to me not an argument for repeating it, but an argument against it.

I suppose it is very true that there is as much land along the Pecos River as there is in Massachusetts, and yet in fifty years the population of Massachusetts has gone from about 1,000,000 to about 3,000,000, and the population of New Mexico has climbed from 65,000 to 195,000. Now, there must be something in the natural resources to account for that. If there are these great opportunities for agriculture already existing it is curious that they have not been developed.

So far as irrigation goes, that is a matter of speculation, a matter of hope. We can not tell yet how far it will develop and what it will develop.

I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me on one point. I did not mean to say that we ought to demand that a State, at the moment when it seeks admission, should have all of the qualifications of a State of the Union that has been a State for twenty, fifty, or one hundred years. I meant to say that it should have a reasonable qualification and also should show those conditions and those natural resources which would promise in the future a population suitable and large enough for statehood.

I do not contend that those conditions have not yet been developed in New Mexico. As far as its being exceptional is concerned, if it is exceptional New Mexico is an exceptional State. We have never before been asked to admit to the Union a Territory inhabited at the time of its acquisition by a Spanish-American population and largely inhabited at the present moment by a similar population. All our States that have been admitted hitherto, whether the population was large or small, were almost without exception States which had been populated from the old States or from Europe, as the old States themselves were populated. That is, in all the new States we were bringing in and making a part of the Union men who for the most part had already been identified with the Union in the States from whence they came.

But here we are confronted with a State where the basis of population is that of the original Spanish-American settlers, and there we are making an entirely new precedent. When we are making an entirely new precedent in regard to territory with a large existence of Spanish-American population, it is well to remember that we have some other territory with Spanish-American populations, and that we ought to be very careful before we make a precedent rashly.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, as I came into the Chamber I heard the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] say that there was an abundance of water for purposes of irrigation. Now, if the distinguished Senator in making that remark was referring to the Territory of New Mexico, I should like to ask the Senator, who is undoubtedly more familiar with the topography of that country than I am, what streams there are in New Mexico available for irrigation aside from the Rio Grande and the Pecos? As I understand it, the Territory of New Mexico is dependent upon those streams. If there are other streams of any considerable size that are available for irrigation there, I am not aware of the fact.

In this connection I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho what his opinion would be as to the future development of irrigation in New Mexico if the Supreme Court should finally conclude to apply the common-law doctrine as to riparian rights to those two interstate streams? I should like to have the Senator inform the Senate, if he is willing, as to what the plight of New Mexico would be if the Supreme Court eventually applied that doctrine to those two streams.

Mr. DUBOIS. I would say to the Senator from Wisconsin, speaking generally, that the Supreme Court could not very well apply that doctrine, I should think, because the water was appropriated first; they were the prior appropriators.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What was the Senator's statement?

Mr. DUBOIS. It would be a very serious question to answer if the Supreme Court makes such a holding as that, not only in regard to these Territories, but in regard to others, my own State included.

Mr. QUARLES. Then I understand that my friend is unable to describe any future development of irrigation if that doctrine were to be applied to those two great streams.

Mr. DUBOIS. Your friend is unable to state what steps he would take, because it would apply elsewhere. Take my own State, for instance, which is the best watered of all the Western States. Our great stream, the Snake River, which carries an immense volume of water and runs all over the State, rises in Montana and it does not flow into Montana at all. It would be quite an interesting question for us if the Supreme Court should hold that we can not use those waters. I contemplate that they would not so hold.

Mr. QUARLES. I evidently am not successful in my effort, which was to elicit from the Senator an expression of opinion as to what effect such a ruling if it should be made would have upon the future irrigation of New Mexico.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am not prepared to express any opinion. I would have to form an opinion very carefully if such a ruling were made.

Mr. QUARLES. Of course the Senator, as a lawyer, will recognize the fact that the doctrine of prior appropriation is not a part of the common-law doctrine.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very fortunately, I am not a lawyer, and therefore I can not see the fine distinction which the Senator is trying to draw. I can imagine in my own mind that reservoirs, for instance, will be built down there. There might be some other methods, if the Supreme Court should make such a ruling, which I as a layman do not believe it will make, by which we could still cultivate our lands.

Mr. QUARLES. Instead of being fortunate, it is unfortunate, for the profession at least, that my distinguished friend is not a lawyer. At the moment I was laboring under the impression that the profession had the honor of counting the distinguished Senator among its representatives. Therefore, of course, I will not press a purely legal consideration upon his attention at this time, but I shall hope at some future time to be able to discuss this question in the Senate from a legal standpoint.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho stated, in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin, that he could imagine such and such a thing might be done down in New Mexico, and that such and such a thing might possibly be done. Does the Senator think that "imaginings" and "mights" and "perhapses" are the things upon which statehood should be built?

Mr. DUBOIS. There are eight reservoirs in Colorado now, from which water is diffused to the adjacent lands. It might happen that they would have some reservoirs, I should think, in New Mexico or in Idaho. We have not any in Idaho yet. It has been demonstrated that we can have reservoirs there and work them successfully. There is no reason to suppose they could not do it in other States where they are needed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I insist that the question put to the Senator, and which he did not answer, nor attempt to answer, is the germ of this whole matter. It is said here that things might happen, and perhaps they could happen. They imagine that in the future so and so will be so and so. Well, then, would it not be a very good thing to wait until those imaginings come true?—because it is conceded that these things which might, and which are imagined, and which perhaps will exist, are the things upon which the State of the future must flourish. Suppose the imaginings do not come true, and suppose the might-bes do not become realities, then would it not be better to wait and find out whether or not they will become realities?—because when the thing is done it is done irrevocably.

Now, about reservoirs, the Senator has had practical experience possibly with reservoirs. I have not; but I have read somewhat of reservoirs. I will ask the Senator if he knows how long it would take, conceding the work to be possible and now begun, conceding further that there was abundance of water to be had, something that the Senator must establish in order to make his proposition good—conceding all those elements, how long would it take, does the Senator think, to build reservoirs and get them in operation, so as to supply even 1,000,000 acres of land? I would be glad to have the Senator answer that question.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin asked me what would be the effect of a Supreme Court decision that would prevent the waters from going down to New Mexico, and in the course of our discussion I said perhaps they would build reservoirs; that I could imagine they would build reservoirs. That was the imagining I was indulging in in answer to that question of the Senator from Wisconsin. It was not, as the Senator from Indiana would try to make it appear, that I was imagining all sorts of things, imagining that something would happen in these Territories. I was answering a direct question of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I beg the pardon of the Senator from Indiana for getting out of patience with him at all.

Mr. President, I think it would not take long to build reservoirs and store water in them and distribute the water through canals on arid wastes, if you had the money; and by the legislation which has been passed, and which I am very glad to say can not be undone, we have got the money, and we will get more of it. It is going into the fund at the rate of eight or ten million dollars a year, and is going to reclaim these waste places. They are making the surveys now in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. The Government is looking to the appropriation of this money in great irrigation works, and it has been demonstrated in this country beyond all cavil that it is the best country ever found for irrigation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I also applaud that great scheme of practical statesmanship, proposed and finally put through very largely by the President of the United States. Further, equally with the Senator from Idaho, I indulge the hope that it will work the wonders expected of it. But every man who knows the subject (and it is not for me to say that the Senator does not know the subject) knows that that is a question for the future. The question is, Suppose it did not result as expected? Suppose the barren wastes of which the Senator speaks were not reclaimed? Then we would be in the condition of having done a thing upon anticipation with the anticipation, which was its foundation, destroyed. Does the Senator think that that is a proper position of wise and cautious and conservative statesmanship?

All this debate has proceeded upon the assumption that great things were going to be done. Had we not better wait until they are done? The whole argument has been based on futures.

The Senator stated that I said he was imagining with reference to a great number of things, and yet my question was with reference to the particular thing which he says he did imagine, to wit, the construction of reservoirs. I asked the Senator, conceding the water to be there, conceding all that he says, how long it would take to construct the reservoirs and build the canals, so as to reclaim for human purposes even a million acres of land? He does not answer it, Mr. President.

Well, as a Senator from a part of the country near, at least, the arid portions of the country, the Senator knows that to create one of those reservoirs would require two or three years, if it was a considerable one. Suppose it did not require more than one year, the Senator's colleague will tell him that it requires thereafter at least three years of water in the reservoir to so saturate the soil that it will not sink in and be soaked up—so as to make the soil so full of water that it will after that retain water—that after that it requires two or three years to get the atmosphere so impregnated that the rest of the water will not evaporate, and that after that a period of time must elapse when the water must soak into the canals, so that their channels will run the water to the fields.

Now, these are things that I get from people who live very near the Senator himself. I do not know them from my own personal experience. Therefore in answer to the Senator's imagining that reservoirs might be built, the practical question immediately confronts us that it would require years before any practical results could be achieved, even admitting that they could be achieved at all. Is it not wiser to wait until that is done; until that land is reclaimed, if it can be, and I hope it can; until the people live there upon it; until population has increased, before we do this irrevocable thing which no power on earth ever can undo? That is the question I put to the Senator.

Mr. BARD. Mr. President, in view of the condition of my voice, which is impaired by recent illness, I am not justified in attempting to make as extended remarks as I might otherwise wish to make on the question of the admission of the Territories, proposed by the omnibus bill now under discussion; but I hope to be able to supplement the almost exhaustive information that has already been presented by the committee's report and by other members of the committee who have preceded me in the debate by stating some additional facts which, in my judgment, should be considered, and explaining the reasons that will control my vote in opposition to the bill.

It will be impracticable for me to take up and review many of the facts which, to my mind, show that neither New Mexico nor Oklahoma, alone and without the Indian Territory, should now be admitted as States; but, in view of the peculiar form of this bill, which submits to us for decision but one proposition, namely, whether or not all of the three Territories shall be admitted to statehood simultaneously, it is only necessary, under the circumstances, for a Senator to indicate his objections to the admission of any one of the three Territories in order to justify his opposition to the whole omnibus bill. Therefore, for the sake of brevity, and for other reasons which will soon be referred to, I shall confine my remarks almost exclusively to Arizona. But my objections to Arizona will be found to apply in a general way also to New Mexico, for its growth in population in the last decade has been slower than Arizona, and its illiteracy is greater.

In this connection I will say that so far as I have discovered there has been no sufficient explanation made either in the other House or here in the discussion of this measure by its friends why it was necessary that the three separate original measures introduced by the Delegates from each of the three Territories should be considered in an omnibus bill, and why they must all stand or all fall together.

We have the statement of a distinguished member of the other House [Mr. GROSVENOR], referring to this bill, that it was apparent that somewhere in the bill there is a weak spot, else there would have been no occasion for the massing together of the Territories in one grand combination seeking votes for a measure that could not have received the votes of the House of Representatives if submitted upon separate propositions.

The only other explanation which I have seen—and that is very general in its character—is given by Mr. KNOX, the chairman of the House Committee on Territories, who, in his opening remarks describing the various provisions of the bill, said:

> If there was any doubt whatever in the minds of the committee—and I do not say there was—upon the question of admitting any Territory, there was no doubt that if any one of the three Territories was entitled to admission, they all were.

It could not be said, he continued, that one Territory was entitled to admission and another was not. He then said:

> Would you undertake to say that a Territory having 500,000 people was entitled to admission and a Territory having 200,000 was not? Then you would have to face the precedents of the past, admitting a majority of the Territories of this country with less population than 200,000. Would you say that a Territory having $50,000,000 of taxable wealth should be admitted and one having $30,000,000 should not? Then you would run counter to the precedents under which a majority of the Territories have been admitted with property of less value. Would you raise an issue in regard to the territorial extent of these communities? Then the decision would still be in favor of admitting all.

But, Mr. President, a Territory might not be entitled to statehood even if it had 500,000 inhabitants; and another Territory might have $60,000,000 or $600,000,000 of taxable wealth, and yet lack other qualifications and be rightfully debarred admission into the Union; and still another Territory might be unfitted for statehood even though its area exceeded that of Alaska.

If other States have been admitted to the Union having less population, less area, or less taxable wealth than any of the three Territories named in the bill, such precedents can not be held to be sufficient in themselves to confer upon either Arizona, New Mexico, or Oklahoma an equality of right with each other or any right whatever to be admitted to the Union.

The conferring of statehood upon a people involves not only the recognition of the preparedness of the people for assuming such dignities and responsibilities, but also involves the consideration of the interests of the States already forming the Union. It is a matter of great importance to the whole people of the United States that when a new State is admitted it should have a population which, in intelligence, morality, and devotion to the principles of our Government, as well as in numbers, will compare favorably with the average of the peoples of the other States. It should be sufficiently equipped with resources, developed or undeveloped, having above all the quality of permanency, which will insure its ability to bear the burdens of the State government for all time without overtaxation of its citizens.

I entered upon the consideration of this bill, fully aware that, by reason of the many close relations, involving common commercial interests, existing between the peoples of Arizona and California, it was expected by many of them that I would have no hesitation to support any measure that is intended to give to our neighboring Territory the long-coveted benefits supposed to be incident to the granting of statehood; and that it was assumed that such a measure, proposing for the West additional representation in the House of Representatives, in the Senate, and in the electoral college, could not fail to receive my support. This expectation was expressed early by the Arizona newspapers, later by some of the leading newspapers of California, and subsequently by some of the representative commercial bodies of California.

These circumstances made it quite easy for me to begin the consideration of the measure with preconceived ideas favorable to the admission of Arizona, at least; and the consideration that the measure had already been passed in its present form by the House of Representatives facilitated the process by which I was being led further to regard it with favor.

It is easy to be misled into erroneous conclusions through partial views and prejudices and sentiment, but when we rise to a realization of our whole duty our view is no longer obscured by the colored atmosphere of selfishness and local interests.

Ordinarily I would subordinate my own judgment to the opinions of the people of my State, when they are fairly and definitely expressed, with full knowledge of all the facts, especially in regard to policies affecting their vital interests alone; but in a matter like the pending question, involving the consideration of my duty as a Senator to the whole people of the United States, I recognize no higher authority and direction than my own judgment and conscience. I may be pardoned for referring to the aspect which the consideration of the measure has assumed to me personally when I state that my action in voting with the majority of the Committee on Territories during the latter part of the first session of this Congress, upon the motion to fix a date for the consideration of this omnibus statehood bill, and also my action in joining the majority of the committee in its adverse report on the bill, has been severely criticised by many of the Arizona newspapers, and by some of the California newspapers, for what they consider my disregard for the interests of that section of the country; and because of this criticism I am the more desirous of briefly indicating the convictions which have governed my action in the matter.

I propose, then, to consider whether Arizona is qualified in respect to the number, character, and intelligence of its population for statehood, and whether the present and possible development of its resources afford satisfactory assurances that they will soon attract and hold permanently a population which will bear a reasonable proportion to the population of the rest of the United States.

I regret that I was prevented from joining the subcommittee when it visited the Territory and from personally investigating the conditions there. My own knowledge concerning Arizona, based only upon my personal observations, is limited, and it would be unfair for me to be influenced entirely by the impressions which are naturally formed from what I have seen during my frequent journeys over the two transcontinental railroads which pass completely across the northern and southern portions of the Territory, for I am aware that the most important towns and the greatest development of its resources are located away from these trunk lines. And the information which I have concerning those better portions of the Territory and my own experience in a semi-arid and semitropical country guard me against the common error which many tourists fall into of supposing that there are no sections of its area more attractive than the dry and desert regions through which they must travel on those routes, or that it is impracticable to make of the desert a fit habitation for man.

In adducing my conclusions I have depended largely upon the information that is open to every citizen and afforded by the census statistics of the United States, by the reports of the governors of the Territories, and by the valuable testimony of the citizens of Arizona, which is reported by the committee.

I do not deem it necessary to apologize if I should repeat some of the essential facts and figures already used over and over again in the remarks of those who have preceded me in this debate, for they are the foundation upon which our conclusions are based, and my remarks as a whole would be incomplete without again stating them.

POPULATION.

The Territory contains within its boundaries 113,000 square miles, or 72,320,000 acres. In 1860 it was a county of New Mexico and had a population of 6,482. It was organized as a Territory February 24, 1863. Exclusive of persons on Indian reservations, it had, in 1870, a population of 9,658; in 1880, 40,440; in 1890, 59,620, and in 1900, 99,550.

The total population as given in the census report for 1900 is 122,931, including 23,381 persons on Indian reservations.

According to the census of 1900, the density of the population of Arizona, including Indians and others on Indian reservations, was 1.1 persons to each square mile, being less than the density of any other State or Territory, except Nevada and Wyoming, the density of which were, respectively, four one-hundredths and nine one-hundredths. In 1890 the density of the whole population of Arizona, exclusive of Indians, was eight one-hundredths, and the apparent increase of the density of population to 1.1 persons per square mile in 1900 is due largely to the inclusion of the 23,381 Indians in the estimate of 1900.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BARD. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So I understand from what the Senator says that if you exclude from the entire population of Arizona the 30,000 Indians that would make the population considerably less than one to the square mile?

Mr. BARD. Yes; that is correct.

By deducting the number of Indians and persons on reservations there is left a population of 99,550 other than Indians, which would give a density of only eighty-eight one-hundredths instead of 1.1 persons; and therefore the increase in the percentage of density for the decade 1890 to 1900 is twenty-two one-hundredths.

We find in the statistical table showing the increase in population from 1890 to 1900 that Arizona gained a population of 40,550, exclusive of persons on Indian reservations, and that this represented an increase of 68 per cent over the census enumeration for 1890.

This statement needs particular explanation. The increase, 40,550, given by the census tables, is the difference between 59,620, which is only a part of the population for 1890, and 100,170, which is also only a part of the population for 1900, and the percentage of increase is calculated, not upon the whole, but only a part of the population of 1890. In each case the Indian population is not included. But a comparison of the aggregate population of 1890, amounting to 88,243 persons, with the aggregate population of 1900, which is 122,931, will produce a very different result. By subtracting the one from the other, we find the increase to be only 34,688, and this is only 39.3 per cent of the aggregate population of 1890.

I have prepared a table showing the census increase for each decade between 1860 and 1900 in the population of Arizona and 13 other Western States and Territories, with the view of comparing the increase for that period in population of Arizona with the increase of the other States, and I ask that this table may be inserted in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLINGTON in the chair). In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The table referred to is as follows:

State or Territory.	Increase.
	1860 to 1870.	1870 to 1880.	1880 to 1890.	1890 to 1900.
Arizona	9,658	30,782	19,180	40,550
California	180,253	304,447	343,436	274,049
Colorado	5,587	154,463	217,871	126,357
Idaho	14,999	17,611	51,775	74,762
Montana	20,595	18,564	93,000	99,400
Nevada	35,634	19,775	16,505	5,099
New Mexico	1,642	27,691	34,028	37,854
Dakota Territory	9,344	120,996
North and South Dakota combined			376,350
North Dakota				120,520
South Dakota				55,079
Oklahoma			61,834	320,407
Oregon	58,458	83,845	138,999	95,907
Utah	46,513	87,177	63,942	67,047
Washington	12,361	51,161	274,274	162,194
Wyoming	9,118	11,671	39,916	29,865

Mr. BARD. This table shows that the only Western States or Territories having a smaller increase of population than Arizona in the decade 1860 to 1870 were Colorado, New Mexico, and Wyoming. In the decade 1870 to 1880 Arizona's increase was only greater than that of Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, and Wyoming; but from 1880 to 1890 Arizona's increase outranked Nevada only, and from 1890 to 1900 Arizona's increase outranked only Nevada and New Mexico.

Colorado, which had a smaller increase of population in the first decade than Arizona, has outstripped Arizona and gained in population 499,836, while Arizona has gained only 113,273. New Mexico has had in every decade (except 1880 to 1890) a smaller increase than Arizona, and has gained 103,436, while Arizona has gained 113,273. Idaho gained 146,773. Montana gained 222,734. Nevada lost 156 people in the forty years. Oklahoma in the last ten years, having but 2,214 more than Arizona in 1890, gained 336,497, or three times as much as Arizona gained in forty years.

The other Western States which had a larger increase of population than Arizona in the four decades increased as follows between 1870 and 1900: California, 924,806—over eight times as much as Arizona; Oregon, 322,613—nearly three times as much as Arizona; Utah, 189,963—77,000 more than Arizona; Washington, 494,148—nearly four and one-half times as much as Arizona; North and South Dakota combined, 706,535—over six and one-fourth times as much as Arizona.

Here I must express my disappointment to find that, while the great West has been making wonderful progress, as indicated by its increase of population as well as by other evidences of growth, these two Territories, Arizona and New Mexico, have lagged so far behind.

The aggregate population of Arizona at the census of 1900 is made up of 92,903 persons denominated white, which include the native and foreign-born Mexican population, and the following, classified as colored persons, namely, 26,480 Indians, 1,848 negroes, 1,419 Chinese, and 281 Japanese; total, 30,028. (See Table IV, p. xx, vol. 2, part 2, Population; Table XXXIX, p. 40, of Abstract.)

According to this classification 75.6 per cent are white and 24.4 per cent are so-called colored. Of the 92,903 whites 22,395, or 24.6 per cent, are foreign born, including foreign-born Mexicans, and 70,508 are native born, including native-born Mexicans.

The total number of white persons of foreign parentage is 48,068, or over 51.7 per cent of the total white population (92,903), leaving 44,835 of native white parentage, or 48.3 per cent of the total white population. (Table VII, p. xxvi, Part II.) The foreign-born Mexican population alone in 1900 was 14,172, or 15.25 per cent of the whole white population (vol. 1, Population, Part I, p. clxxiv), and the foreign-born Mexican population in 1890 being 11,334, an increase for the decade is shown of 2,838 in the foreign-born Mexican population, or over 25 per cent. (See House Executive Documents, second session Fifty-third Congress, Vol. 15, report of Governor L. C. Hughes for 1893, quoting from Eleventh Census.)

Thirty-one and five-tenths per cent, or 12,002 of all the white persons of foreign parentage, including foreign-born whites, 10 years of age and over, can not speak English (Table 73, p. 124, abstract), and there are in the Territory 27,468 persons, white and colored, 10 years of age and over, or about 22.5 per cent of the whole population, who can not speak English. (Table 58, p. 76, abstract.) And there are 50,308 persons, or 40.9 per cent of the whole population, who are of foreign parentage. (Table LXXXIV, p. clxxxii, vol. 1, Population, Part I.)

Of the total population (being 122,931) 71,795 are males and 51,136 are females. There were 19,552 more males than females over 15 years of age, the excess of females being 16 per cent of the whole population.

Of the 51,014 males over 15 years of age nearly 50 per cent, or 25,249 were single.

Fifty-five and one-half per cent, or 28,459, are single, widowed, or divorced, and only 44½ per cent, or 22,555, married.

This, taken in connection with other facts, would indicate that a large part of the male population is of a transient character or is not permanently settled.

ILLITERACY.

The total white population of Arizona is classified as follows:

Native white—
Native parents	44,890
Foreign parents	25,678
Foreign white	22,395
Aggregate	92,963
Total colored population	30,028

Illiterates are persons at least 10 years of age, unable to both read and write any language.

The aggregate illiterates in Arizona (table 84, p. 479) is 27,307, classified as follows:

Native white—
Native parents	1,266
Foreign parents	1,850
Total native white	3,066
Foreign white	7,552
Total white	10,618
Colored, including 211 negroes	16,659
Aggregate of illiterates	27,307

The percentage of illiteracy in the total population of Arizona, ten years of age and over, is 29 per cent. (Table LIV, p. c., vol. 2, Part II.)

The illiteracy of its white population is 14.9 per cent and the illiteracy of its colored population, which means Indians, negroes, and Mongolians, is 73.56 per cent. The illiteracy of its foreign population is 35.3.

It is important to observe, while the percentage of illiteracy in the white population of Arizona is 14.9, that of the white population of the continental United States is only 6.2, and that the percentage of illiteracy for the whole of the United States, including all Indians, negroes, and other inferior populations, is only 10.7 per cent, against Arizona's 29 per cent; and that the percentage of illiterates among the white population of the Western division, of which Arizona is a part, is only 4.1 per cent, against Arizona's 14.9 per cent. (Table LVII, p. 75, Abstract.)

I have prepared a table which will assist in making a comparison of the illiteracy of Arizona with that of the western census division, of which it is a part, and I ask that it may be printed at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The table referred to is as follows:

State or Territory.	Total illiteracy.	White illiteracy.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Arizona	29	14.9
Colorado	4.2	3.8
New Mexico	35.2	29.9
Utah	3.1	2.2
Nevada	13.3	2.7
Idaho	4.6	1.9
Washington	3.1	1.5
Oregon	3.3	1.4
California	4.8	3.1
Oklahoma	5.5	2.9
Indian Territory	19	14.1
Texas	14.5	8.5

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With the permission of the Senator, may I ask him if he has got tabulated in this very interesting table how many of the 123,000 population of Arizona are Indians, how many Mexicans, either of foreign-born parentage or Mexican and native parentage, and how many are what are known down there as Americans? Has the Senator the numbers of those three elements?

Mr. BARD. I have given the number of those who were born in Mexico.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call attention to this point because it seems to me important that we should know the elements that compose the 123,000 people. But, roughly speaking, my recollection is that, as the Senator shows, out of the 123,000 people in this Territory, which is as large as New England and New York put together, there are 30,000 Indians, between twenty-seven and twenty-eight thousand or more Mexicans, I have forgotten the number who are Indians and half-breeds, leaving but 55,000 or 60,000 of what are called down there Americans, who populate a Territory as great in extent as all of New England and New York. So the question with reference to this very thing comes down to the admission of a Territory as great as New England and New York populated by 123,000 people, of whom about 30,000 are Indians and about 28,000 are Mexicans, and the rest, with the exception of some Indian half-breeds, are what are called down there Americans.

Mr. BARD. I have submitted some statistics as to that point.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That, I think, is a pretty serious business.

Mr. BARD. The census reports do not make any distinction between the Mexican population and the American population, so far as I have been able to discover.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The other day I myself put into the RECORD a table upon that subject.

Mr. BARD. Mr. President, we find that the illiteracy of both its total population and its white population is greater than that of every State and Territory of the Western division, except New Mexico.

The high percentage of illiteracy of the white population in Arizona may be charged principally to the Mexican population employed along its railroads and in its mines. But in this connection I desire to say that I have no prejudice against the Mexican people and no disposition to be unjust to them. I am familiar with the characteristics of the Spanish-speaking people of my own State. At the time of the admission of California to statehood they constituted a large portion of its population, and have contributed a fair share of the men who have aided in the upbuilding and directing the affairs of our State, and have shared in many of the honors which a State may confer upon its citizens.

It is probable that the present and later generations of the Mexican people of Arizona will, as a class, improve under the influences of the common schools and other American institutions, so that they will at some time fully appreciate the privileges of their citizenship and rise to the level of literacy and civilization upon which the average American citizen stands. They are now far below that level.

This description of the character and conditions of the population of Arizona will be by no means complete without referring to the fact that it is estimated that of the 92,903 white people a large percentage are Mormons. In 1890 they constituted one-fifth of the population, according to the census. The governors of the Territory of Arizona, at various times in its history, found occasion to refer specifically to them, and to their standing as citizens, and I have culled from their reports the following remarks:

In 1889 Governor Wolfley, in urging Congress to reestablish the Territorial law which disfranchised all who practiced, taught, or encouraged polygamy, and which had been repealed by the last legislature of the Territory, speaks of them as follows:

> Morally and politically the Mormons are an unwelcome and a dangerous element. Morally, their teaching and encouraging, if not actually practicing, polygamy is against all established Christian law, moral or religious. * * * Politically, the Mormons seem to have adopted the plan of sending colonies or "stakes" to the surrounding Territories in sufficient numbers to form a balance of power between the two political parties. They are willing to trade with either, but remain true only so long as the interests of the church are best served.
> The church is their law, and all other law is subservient to the orders of the church. They are therefore a most dangerous and unscrupulous factor in politics, without regard to party. Four years ago they voted for the Republican Delegate to Congress; two years ago and last year they voted for the Democratic Delegate, in payment for the repeal of the above-referred-to disfranchising act, passed by my late predecessor. Who they will next vote for will depend upon who will or who can make them the best offer or do them the most service. (House Ex. Docs., 1889-1890, Fifty-first Congress, first session, vol. 13, pp. 250-251.)

Governor Wolfley states that, at that time, the Mormons numbered about 8,000.

In the following year (1890) Governor N. O. Murphy estimates the number of Mormons in Arizona at 12,000, which he says "is one-fifth of our population under the census," and that, in view of the restrictive legislation in Idaho and the probability of similar action in Utah, it is more than likely that the immigration of that class of people to Arizona will rapidly increase; and, in his concluding remarks, he devotes considerable space in stating the facts as they appear to him in reference to the Mormons. He says:

> The influences of the Mormon Church upon the progress of Western civilization and their effects, socially and morally, are vexatious. It seems to be generally accepted by the highest modern intelligence that the public welfare and the general good of our people will be best subserved by legislative restrictions upon the Mormons, and it has been the policy of the Government and of communities wherever the followers of Mormonism have gained a foothold in this country to restrain, by legislative enactment, the extension of Mormon power and influence. (House Ex. Docs., 51st Cong., 2d sess., vol. 15, pp. 491, 492.)

In his reference to the convention held under an act of the legislature of Arizona, approved March 19, 1891, for the formation of a State constitution, which convention was in session at the time of the writing of the report, Governor Murphy says:

> The principal bone of contention so far developed between the political parties in the convention is the question of following the example of Idaho in the matter of the "test oath," as applied to Mormons exercising the right of franchise. The Democrats oppose the "test oath" and the Republicans favor it. The Democrats claim that the Republicans favor the measure because the Mormons of Arizona vote the Democratic ticket, and that the question is entirely political and not moral, and the proposed "oath," if required by the constitution, would be an unjust and unconstitutional discrimination on account of religious belief; that the Mormons have renounced the practice of polygamy and bigamy by edict of their church authorities, and that they conform to the laws of the country, are worthy people, and are entitled to the same consideration accorded to other citizens.
> On the other hand, the Republicans claim that the question is more moral than political, notwithstanding that the Mormons vote the Democratic ticket to a man; that the renunciation of the crimes of polygamy and bigamy by edict of their leaders is not sincere, and is only done for a purpose, and that those crimes against society still form the keystone to the arch of their faith; that they do not recognize the supremacy of the State over their church; that they exercise the right of franchise blindly as a class, and under orders from selfish and interested motives, and are consequently unfitted to exercise such a right, no matter what political party they favor, unless they are willing to subscribe to the oath referred to.

And again he says:

> It is also claimed here by independent thinkers that, owing to the junction of Arizona with Utah, it would be very easy to so colonize the Territory with Mormons by either political party (which they might be inclined to favor) as to absolutely control the affairs of state for a long time, and it is true that they do now hold the balance of political power in Arizona. (House Ex. Docs., 52d Cong., 1st sess., vol. 16, p. 318.)

In his report for 1893 Governor L. C. Hughes makes a statement regarding the strength of the various church organizations in the Territory at that time, from which we find that the Mormons had more churches in the Territory than any other denomination. He also informs us that in the last election the Mormons cast a vote of 1,500 out of a total vote of 7,738 cast on the question of the adoption of a constitution. He further says concerning the Mormon population: "This population does not exceed one-eighth of our people." But it will be observed that the Mormon vote was about one-fifth of the whole vote cast on the question of adoption of a constitution.

I notice that in the later report of the governor to the Secretary of the Interior, Governor Hughes states that the practice of polygamy by the Mormons in Arizona is "unknown," and they are a thrifty, industrious, and law-abiding class of citizens. His choice of the word "unknown" is singular and perhaps significant. Nevertheless, if they have been insincere in their professions of obedience to the laws prohibiting polygamy or bigamy as late as 1890, there is a possibility that in this respect some of them at least would violate the law again unless further restrained by local public opinion and regulations, and I now refer to a feature of the omnibus bill which ought not escape the attention of anyone charged with the careful investigation of it.

I refer to the clauses intended to prevent the practice of polygamy in the proposed new States. The original House bills introduced by the Delegates from New Mexico and Arizona contained nothing in regard to polygamy, and, as we know, the omnibus bill was made up, without material alteration, from the separate bills introduced by the Delegates from the Territories; but that, in the Committee of the Whole House on May 9, 1901, an amendment was proposed by Representative ROBERTS, and adopted, which provided in respect to Arizona that "polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited," and the amendment was agreed to.

Just before the omnibus bill was passed by the House, Mr. RODEY, the Delegate from New Mexico, probably intending to correct an oversight in his bill, proposed an amendment which provided that the prohibition of polygamy should also apply to New Mexico; which amendment was also adopted. But in respect to Oklahoma the provision relative to polygamy, which was already in the original bill introduced by Delegate FLYNN, was retained in the omnibus bill without any change.

This proviso relating to polygamy in Oklahoma, however, is not the same as the amendments applying to New Mexico and Arizona. It reads as follows:

> And said convention shall provide by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State: First, That perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to legalize the practice of polygamy.

There seems to be no good reason why the prohibitory clause should not be uniform in its application to all of the proposed new States. The omission of the prohibition in respect to Oklahoma gives emphasis to its application to the two other Territories. The proviso relating to Oklahoma is not a prohibition of polygamy, for it would be no contravention of the proposed ordinance for Oklahoma if its legislature should at any time legalize the practice of polygamy.

The acquiescence of the Delegate from Arizona in the adoption of the amendment in reference to prohibition of polygamy in his Territory, and the introduction by the Delegate from New Mexico of a similar amendment applying to New Mexico, is an acknowledgment of the propriety and necessity for taking a further precaution against the practice of polygamy in these proposed new States, notwithstanding there are United States laws upon the subject which may fairly be considered sufficient and efficacious in any communities where there is a sound public opinion to support the law.

The cold statistics relative to the population of Arizona, which I have recited, are very material and are reliable. They reveal the general character, conditions, and intelligence of a large part of the population of Arizona upon whom this measure intends to confer the dignity of statehood.

By reason of the facts above given in reference to the population of Arizona, namely, that the density of the whole population is only one and one-tenth persons to the square mile; that the increase of population for the last decade was only in fact 39.3 per cent, or at a rate of about 4,000 persons per annum; that such increase is less than that of any of the States and Territories of the western division except Nevada and New Mexico; that 24 per cent of its white population is foreign born; that 40.9 per cent of the whole population is of foreign parentage; that of every 12 inhabitants 7 are males and 5 are females, and that the percentage of illiteracy of its white population compared with other States is very high—I am compelled to conclude that Arizona does not have a population which, in numbers, bears a reasonable proportion to the population of the nation as a whole, and that the average rank of its citizens is not yet high enough to entitle it to an equal footing with the original States of the Union.

This conclusion is not unjust nor disparaging to that element of the population of Arizona who have had the training in citizenship which Americans usually have, and who, in respect to intelligence, courage, and devotion to the principles of our Government, will compare favorably with the best citizenship of any State. Nor is it disparaging to the brave and hardy pioneers who have removed obstacles from the path which the westward course of empire takes; nor to the men who, intelligently and with faith in the future of the Territory, began and will continue the reclamation of that vast arid region, and who have already done and are doing so much in developing the resources of its mountains. Such men, though not strong numerically, will yet accomplish much more.

RESOURCES OF THE TERRITORY.

I do not propose to repeat the statistics which have already been presented by the Senators from Vermont, New Hampshire, and Minnesota, and the other Senators who have preceded me, in order to show the character, extent, and value of the resources of Arizona; but I think it will be interesting and instructive to make comparisons with the view of determining what has been the growth of wealth and the rate of the progress of the development of the mineral, grazing, and agricultural resources of the Territory for the last twenty years. In order to make such comparisons, it is necessary to ascertain first what were the conditions of these industries and how far they had been already developed in 1883, and then to compare the facts thus ascertained with the present conditions.

This comparison will be more graphic if we shall pay less attention to the statistical tables of the census reports, although, of course, we must occasionally refer to them, and shall rely mainly upon the annual reports of the Territorial governors for the period mentioned. This source of information has not yet been used much in this discussion, and I submit that it is fair to use the data and opinions and conclusions thus presented by the chief executive officers of the Territorial government, who have, in accordance with their duty, presented the essential facts showing the annual progress and conditions of their respective Territories.

I have collated from the reports of the governors of Arizona and New Mexico and Oklahoma the assessed valuations of all property in each of the Territories for twenty years. I know that while these valuations may not represent the full values of all the property assessed in each year, and that there may not be the same basis for valuation in all of the Territories, nevertheless they will serve to indicate approximately the growth of the wealth and the increase in the value of property that has contributed to the support of the Territorial government.

Frequent references have been made in these governors' reports to the effect that, under the system in vogue, which unfortunately is used in other Western States, considerable taxable property is not returned to the assessors, and that the valuations of the assessed property are usually lower than their fair cash values. Perhaps as the community grows older the taxpayers may learn that correct returns and fair cash valuations will result in a more just and perfect distribution of the charge against the property and in a corresponding reduction of the tax rate, but Arizona, like many of the States, has not yet adequately remedied the admitted defects in its system of taxation.

I have in my hand a comparative table of assessed valuations of taxable properties in the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, collated, as I have said, from the reports of the governors from 1883 to 1902, inclusive, in respect to Arizona and New Mexico, and from 1891 to 1902, inclusive, for Oklahoma, which I desire to have printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the table will be inserted in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

1902	39,083,178.00	38,227,878.00	72,677,423.00

Mr. BARD. It is observed that, with respect to Arizona, there is a gradual decline in the assessed valuations each consecutive year for a whole decade following 1883. I will state that, because of the repeated decline in these valuations after 1883, I feared that the figures for that year were erroneous, but in the report for 1894 I came across a verification of it in the statement of the governor that the valuation for 1894 amounted, in round numbers, to $27,000,000 ($27,060,975), and that it was about $9,000,000 less than the assessed valuation for 1883, which was $36,000,860.

It will be observed from this statement that the total assessed value of property in Arizona was higher in 1883, the beginning of our period of twenty years, than it was in any year, except the years 1901 and 1902, and that for the whole period the apparent gain in the assessed valuation of property in Arizona for the twenty years is only $3,076,318, or at the rate of $153,826 per annum.

In 1886 there was a decrease of over $5,000,000 in the assessed valuations of property below the returns for 1885. This decrease was due in part to the temporary discouragement and prevention of immigration caused by the raids of the renegade Apaches under the lead of Geronimo and Natches. Under such circumstances it is fair to presume that much property could not be reached or was undervalued by the assessor. The legislative assembly of 1885 created a Territorial board of equalization to revise the assessments of the different counties and to see that all property is assessed at the true cash value as the law requires, and the assessment for the next year shows an increase of only $3,000,000. But if we take the lowest annual assessed valuation reported for the twenty years, being for the year 1886 $23,206,918.65, and compare it with the valuation of 1902, the increase in the last sixteen years seems to be $15,776,260, or at the annual rate of $986,000.

It is a surprise to find Arizona thus admitting that her wealth is so inconsiderable when compared with her area and that the accumulations of her wealth and the progress of the development of her resources have been so slow, as is indicated by her equalized assessment rolls.

Note, too, that, side by side with Arizona, New Mexico makes a similar confession. The assessed valuation of property in New Mexico for 1883 is $27,137,903, and the assessment of property in New Mexico for 1902 is $38,227,878. The gain for the twenty years is about $11,000,000, or an average annual increase of $550,000. Her assessment valuations have fluctuated, rising from $27,137,903 in 1883, and reaching their highest point of $46,041,010 in 1889. Since then they have decreased, and in 1901 had fallen to $36,977,048, a lower valuation than for any year since 1884. There is an actual decrease of $7,813,122, if we compare the assessed valuation for 1889 with that of 1902. For the thirteen years this would be an average annual decrease of over $600,000.

On the other hand, look at the table and observe what a different story is told by the increase in the assessed valuations of property in Oklahoma. Beginning with the year 1891, there has been an increase, year by year, except for the year 1896; and in the five years from 1897 to 1902 Oklahoma gained in assessed property $40,640,000, which gain alone is over $1,500,000 more than the total valuation of all the assessed property in Arizona in 1902, and over $2,000,000 more than the total assessed valuation of property in New Mexico in 1902. Oklahoma has $33,594,245 more assessed property on her tax rolls than Arizona, and nearly double as much as has New Mexico.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLINGTON in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BARD. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to inquire of the junior Senator from California whether it would not be more agreeable to him to finish his remarks when this bill is next under consideration?

Mr. BARD. It would be. My voice is becoming weaker.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like very much to have a little executive session, and if it is agreeable to the Senator I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BARD. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Illinois withhold that motion for just a minute?

Mr. CULLOM. All right.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make just one remark, in order that it may go into the RECORD along with the statement which I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made in his closing sentences. I was not in the Chamber at the time, but I have been told that he spoke in almost unmeasured criticism of the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to make the statehood bill an amendment to an appropriation bill.

I wish to call attention to the fact that that is nothing unusual, as the remarks of the Senator, as they have been reported to me, would seem to indicate, but quite in accordance with the practice that has obtained here under similar circumstances ever since I have been a member of the Senate.

I remember, as all Senators must, that when we were considering the Army appropriation bill, we attached to it as a rider, if I may use that expression, a bill providing for civil government in the Philippine Islands. It was bitterly criticised at the time, but it was supported by a majority of the Senate. I might mention a number of other cases, and would, except that I do not wish to delay the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The report has not yet been made.

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator from Ohio pardon me? No State ever was admitted into the Union by provisions in an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; I yield to the Senator from New Jersey, and will take great pleasure in answering him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would be glad if Senators would observe the rule of the Senate and first address the Chair before interrupting a Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. Answering the Senator from New Jersey, it is true perhaps that no State has ever been admitted to the Union by an amendment to an appropriation bill, but the principle is not different—it does not need any argument to show that—in the case now presented and criticised by the Senator from Massachusetts from that in the case presented when we provided for civil government in the Philippine Islands by an amendment to the Army appropriation bill.

I might mention a number of other cases, but I do not wish to take the time to do it. However, I will call attention to the fact that only to-day there were reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, by the unanimous vote of that committee, amendments to the Army appropriation bill providing for general legislation to create a general staff and also to provide for the retirement of Army officers with an advanced rank.

I mention this not to discuss it, but simply to call attention to the fact that what the Senator from Massachusetts, according to the remarks reported to me, seemed to think was unheard of is not unheard of at all.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. FORAKER. It is simply a question in every case whether or not a majority of the Senate want to do the thing that it is proposed to do, the majority of the Senate having it in their power always to make any such amendment as in their judgment may be necessary and to enact such legislation as in their judgment the best interests of the country require.

Mr. SCOTT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please be in order.

Mr. CULLOM. I myself had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg pardon.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Ohio has just said, I hold before me the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the amendment put on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army. I will ask that the amendment be inserted in my remarks without being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

All military, civil, and judicial powers necessary to govern the Philippine Islands, acquired from Spain by the treaties concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898, and at Washington on the 7th day of November, 1900, shall, until otherwise provided by Congress, be vested in such person and persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for the establishment of civil government and for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of said islands in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion: Provided, That all franchises granted under the authority hereof shall contain a reservation of the right to alter, amend, or repeal the same.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, just one moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLAY. I will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That a certain amendment be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAY. I notice that in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there follows the vote taken on the amendment. We know that was an amendment which invested the President of the United States with power to govern the Philippine Islands during a certain period of time and until Congress should otherwise direct.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has taken the position that this proposed amendment is revolutionary. Let us see what was his position at that time.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] made the point of order that this amendment was general legislation.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. The Chair submitted to the Senate for its decision the question whether the amendment was in order. That was the question before the Senate, and on it a yea-and-nay vote was had. I find that the Senators voting that the amendment was in order and ought to be attached to the appropriation bills were as follows:

ALDRICH, ALLISON, BAKER—

I will simply ask that their names be inserted in the RECORD, for I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate. Among the Senators voting in favor of placing the amendment upon the appropriation bill was the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia that the list of names be inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It saves him from reading it. Of course nobody objects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the extract will be printed the RECORD.

The extract is as follows:

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama raises the point of order that this amendment is general legislation. The Chair submits the question to the Senate for its decision. Is the amendment in order? is the question before the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. On that question I ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. I do not see him at present in the Chamber. I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MONEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). This seems to be a political division, and I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that his pair be transferred to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], with whom I have a general pair, and then we can both vote.

Mr. MORGAN. All right. I vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is not present, and I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay," if I had the privilege of voting.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. I inquire if he has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. Then I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "yea," and I think he would vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY. I will state that my colleague [Mr. JONES of Arkansas] would vote "nay," if he were here.

Mr. CHILTON (after having voted in the negative). I will ask if the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Aldrich,	Dillingham,	Lodge,	Quarles,
Allison,	Dolliver,	McComas,	Scott,
Baker,	Fairbanks,	McCumber,	Sewell,
Bard,	Foster,	McMillan,	Shoup,

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CULLOM. I want the Chair to know that I yielded to the Senator from Ohio to make a remark or two, expecting to be recognized when he got through, and I have not been able to secure recognition so far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator from Illinois to permit me to ask the Chair a question as to the parliamentary condition, and only that.

Mr. CULLOM. I think, if I may be allowed to say a word, that this discussion might just as well take place to-morrow.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think so.

Mr. CULLOM. It is very important that we should have a little executive session, not for the ratification of treaties to-night, because it is too late, but there are some other treaties which ought to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations to-day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I agree with that, but I wish to ask the Chair a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield that the Senator may ask a question of the Chair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is all I want to do.

Mr. President, I wish to know whether a report from any committee has been made here to-day of any of the amendments which were offered yesterday to any one of the appropriation bills? That is what I wish to know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to state.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That I desire to know.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Can any information be obtained?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know whether those reports have been made or not. If the Senator bases his question on any statement I made, my statement was that the Committee on Military Affairs this morning reported back the Army appropriation bill with amendments which provide for general legislation, one of them being to provide for the creation of a general staff and the other being to provide for the retirement of officers.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is satisfactory as to the Army appropriation bill; but what I want to know is whether any of those amendments have been reported.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I insist upon my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 30, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 29, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 16333. An act to change and fix the time for holding district and circuit courts of the United States for the eastern division of the eastern district of Arkansas.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HOAR, Mr. FAIRBANKS, and Mr. TURNER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 6719) to change and fix the term for holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the eastern division of the eastern district of Arkansas.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3512) concerning minimum punishment in certain cases arising in the Indian Territory.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING ON CLAIMS BILLS.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be adopted by unanimous consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, on Friday, January 30, 1903, under special order adopted December 2, 1901, bills reported by the Committee on Claims shall be taken up in such order as selected by the chairman of said committee.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in reference to this proposed resolution. While the resolution states that the bills will be taken up as selected by the chairman of the committee, the arrangement agreed upon is that a Democratic member representing the Committee on Claims shall select half the bills to be called up, and I shall select the other half, the call alternating, one bill being taken up on one side of the House, and the next bill on the other side, so long as we may have time to consider these bills to-morrow. This plan was adopted at the second session of the last Congress and it worked satisfactorily to all the members of the House. To-morrow will, in all probability, be the only day during the remainder of this session devoted to bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand that the object is to take up claims so far as possible that are unexceptionable.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir; so far as possible.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. So as to preclude as far as may be the necessity for inquiry or debate in regard to these bills?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir. The call will alternate from one side of the House to the other.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the proposed resolution will be adopted.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GRAFF, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STATUES OF CHARLES CARROLL AND JOHN HANSON.

Mr. PEARRE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the members of the Maryland statuary commission be admitted to the floor of the House of Representatives, in seats to be provided for them, during the ceremonies incident to the acceptance of the statues of Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson, presented by the State of Maryland to the Government of the United States, on Saturday, January 31, at 3 p. m.; and

Resolved further, That the southeast and southwest ladies' galleries be reserved for the relatives of the said Charles Carroll of Carrollton and John Hanson and for such citizens of Maryland as may attend these ceremonies.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This resolution having been adopted, the Doorkeeper will be governed by this action of the House.

HEIRS OF AARON VAN CAMP AND VIRGINIUS P. CHAPIN.

Mr. GRAFF. I desire to call up a conference report on the bill (S. 342) for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin. I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the House conferees be read and that the reading of the report be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The statement was read, as follows:

The conferees on the part of the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Committee on Claims to the Senate bill No. 342, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin," respectfully submit their conference report herewith, and submit the following statement as to the effect of the adoption of said conference report:

The bill, if passed, would refer said claim to the Court of Claims to hear and determine the question of the liability of the United States for certain losses suffered by the claimants, as alleged by them, by reason of the acts of an alleged court unlawfully formed and convened by one Jonathan S. Jenkins, as United States consul and vice-commissioner for the consulate of Apia, Navigators Islands. The facts in the case were heard and determined by the Court of Claims heretofore, and findings of fact covering exhaustively the circumstances of the case, including the losses suffered by the claimants, were made by the court, but the legal liability of the United States to the claimants was not determined.

The bill as amended by the House had stricken from it the authority for the court to consider the former proceedings by the Court of Claims had in said cause and claim, and also the authority to consider as evidence in the new hearing the authority for the court to consider as evidence documents and reports of Congressional committees. The effect of the conferees' report is to authorize the considering by the court as evidence the former proceedings of the Court of Claims in said claim, and to exclude the authority formerly given in the bill as passed by the Senate for the court to consider the documents and reports of Congressional committees.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
D. J. FOSTER,
CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Conferees of the House.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Committee on Claims to the bill S. 342, an act for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

1. That the Senate concur in that portion of the House amendment striking out all of the words after the word "Documents," in lines 16 and 17, page 2, down to and including the word "Government," on line 19, page 2.

2. That the House recede from all the balance of its amendment to said bill.

JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
D. J. FOSTER,
CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. McCUMBER,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The motion was adopted.

On motion of Mr. GRAFF, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES JUDGES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 3287) to fix the salaries of certain judges of the United States, said bill having been returned from the Senate with a message that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House and had asked for a conference.

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. JENKINS, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. SMITH of Kentucky as conferees on the part of the House.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. GROSVENOR in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15804) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction, purchase, lease, and repair of school buildings, and sewerage, water supply, and lighting plants, and purchase of school sites, or additions thereto, and improvement of buildings and grounds, $250,000; in all, $1,490,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "and fifty," in line 17, and substitute for the words "and ninety," in line 19, the words "and forty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. BURTON. Reserving a couple of minutes, I should like to ask what is included in this item, whether it includes all repairs and purchases, etc., for the reservation and nonreservation schools, and does it refer to one particular branch of the service?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it refers to all schools other than those specifically appropriated for in this bill. It includes over 200 school plants and hundreds upon hundreds of buildings all over the country, many of the buildings being those that were originally Army posts and necessarily requiring a particularly large expenditure in the way of repairs and improvements. The value of all the buildings covered by this amendment is something over $5,000,000, and the ordinary wear and tear upon any building, I think experience would show, is at least 5 per cent. So that without any additions, without constructing new buildings—and every year it has been found necessary to construct some new buildings—without the question of the extension of water, sewers, and matters of that kind, it would, with the ordinary percentage of wear and tear of buildings, require this sum. When we take into consideration the further fact that these buildings are occupied by young people—children and students—whose occupancy means the hardest possible wear that any building can be subjected to, it seems to me that the appropriation, to use moderate language, is very reasonable.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a further question. Does not the use of the words "construction, purchase, lease, and repair of school buildings, * * * and purchase of school sites" authorize the Indian Department to purchase buildings for schools where schools are not now established?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does.

Mr. BURTON. Or sites for schools where they are not now established?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does, and it is so intended, and portions of that fund have time and again been used for the purchase of existing schools which, prior to the changed policy of the Government, three or four years ago, had been conducted as so-called sectarian or contract schools. We ceased to appropriate for them and, rather than build new buildings, some of the buildings of the sectarian or contract schools have been purchased, and they have since been conducted as Government schools.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out the last two words in line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Does the gentleman from New York say to the committee that it is the settled Indian policy to allow a Commissioner to establish schools at will and purchase sites without any authority for any specific school from Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes, certainly; that has been the policy for many years. That is a part of his duty in administering and expending the funds which we provide, and time and again there have been amendments incorporated into the bill—I think always in the Senate—which appropriated specifically for the establishment of some new reservation school, not one for which we specifically appropriate, and this body through its committee has opposed that policy, believing that it ought to be in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs where to locate and provide new reservation day and boarding schools.

Mr. BURTON. Has the attention of the gentleman from New York been called to the fact that this appropriation is $50,000 larger than it was a year ago?

Mr. SHERMAN. It has not, because such is not the fact, and for this reason: A first glance at the bill of last year would of course make one think so; but in another part of the bill there was a provision for $50,000 additional last year, which came about in this wise: Last year the House appropriated $200,000. The Senate appropriated upward of $50,000, in the manner I have described a moment ago, providing for the construction of a school at a particular point. The Senate eventually receded from that amendment with an amendment which added $50,000 to the general fund, making the fund $250,000; so that in last year's bill that item will appear in two different places, which would lead the gentleman to suppose that $200,000 was all that was appropriated.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly in support of this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield to the gentleman the balance of my five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate on this amendment is exhausted, under the rule.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed for three minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. The chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERMAN] has very candidly and clearly stated one of the chief defects of this system, and has described a condition which explains much of the extravagance of the Indian schools. The Commissioner has authority to establish schools—reservation, day, boarding, etc.—at will. When he, from a survey of the situation, establishes those which he thinks desirable, the House or the Senate proceeds to put on a number of others. Either these should all be authorized by act of Congress, or the matter should be left exclusively with the executive department.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I think he misunderstood me. The matter is exclusively with the Department, save for these 29 nonreservation schools, for which we specifically appropriate, item by item, and which follow in the bill.

Mr. BURTON. If the nonreservation schools are to be established by Congress, the reservation schools should be as well. There ought to be one rule for all.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this system has attained a degree of extravagance which should call for a halt, and that the cutting off of $50,000 from this item, which is side by side with specific appropriations for a number of particular schools, will not hamper the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to strike out "$50,000."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask to recur to page 33, line 23, for the purpose of offering an amendment which I will send up. It is the amendment about which I have spoken to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi ask unanimous consent to return to page 33, line 23, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 23, page 33, after the word "dollars," the following:
That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available, for the purpose of aiding full-blood Mississippi Choctaws to remove to the Indian Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order against the amendment until I have heard the explanation of the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that was on the bill at the last session, and was taken up in the Senate by an understanding with me, because it probably would involve some dispute among the negotiators of the treaty. It is for the purpose of enabling the poorer ones of the full-blood Mississippi Choctaws to be removed to the Indian Territory. It is the same amount that was agreed upon at the last session by the House, and I understand there is no objection to it from the Committee on Indian Affairs or from any member of it.

There are about 1,000 of these people, probably, of the full blood. The amendment takes into consideration only the full bloods. They are a very worthy people, very honest, and very poor. They have a right to participate in the lands in severalty, provided they comply with the law which is upon the statute book. A part of that law requires that they remove to the Indian Territory, and they are too poor to move.

Mr. LACEY. Is there any roll or any other evidence by which those of the full blood in Mississippi could be designated, to have the benefits of this provision?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The Dawes Commission has made a roll including not only the full bloods, but others.

Mr. LACEY. Has it designated which are the full bloods and which are not? There might be a good deal of difficulty in executing this proposition to select for transportation those of the full blood. It is a little difficult sometimes to tell by looking at them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not think it is. I think that is a matter that will prove itself pretty well. At any rate, it will be left to the Secretary to determine, and he could make arrangements so as to safeguard the meaning of the amendment. There is a roll of the Mississippi Choctaws, but I am only trying to take care of those full bloods who are very poor. The other people will be able to get there themselves—most of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. On what do you base the amount, $20,000?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] and myself and some of the other members of the committee concluded at the last session, when that was put upon the bill, that that amount would accomplish the purpose, and maybe it would not require that much.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then you in some way reached a satisfactory conclusion as to the number of full bloods?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you now recall what that number was?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We estimated them at about 1,000, and thought they could be transported for $20 apiece.

Mr. SHERMAN. Your amendment simply contemplates transporting and does not contemplate giving them any assistance at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not after they get there.

Mr. SHERMAN. Merely removing them to the Indian Territory?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is all; so that they can comply with the requirements of the law. The requirement of the law is that they go there, announce their intention to become permanent settlers and citizens, and then they get their lands after a certain length of time.

Mr. SHERMAN. And what you are asking for these Indians has been done for other Indians in the past?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What it has done for some of these very people, in 1820, who were removed by Government assistance.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would the gentleman object to the insertion of a provision that this applied to the indigent full-blood Indians?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, I would not.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman would, I should have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by inserting the word "indigent" before the word "full-blood."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks to modify the amendment as he has indicated.

Mr. LACEY. I would suggest to the gentleman that he insert such modification as would enable the Secretary of the Interior to exercise a discretion in this matter, otherwise it will be almost impossible to carry out the purpose he has in view.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I differ with the gentleman from Iowa about that. It seems to me perfectly easy to know what is a full-blood Choctaw.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that the Clerk was unable to hear the modification of his amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. To insert the word "indigent" just before the word "full-blood" in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered as modified. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. McRAE. I would suggest to the gentleman that he had better substitute the word "indigent" for "full-blood."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will tell the gentleman why I do not feel like doing that. There are a great many trying to parade as Choctaw Indians who are not.

Mr. McRAE. And there are a great many denied who are, but are not full-blooded. In the treaty no distinction is made between full-bloods and descendants of full-bloods, and unless "indigent" is put in it would work to the disadvantage of those that have the white blood, and they are as good as the others.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not as good an Indian.

Mr. McRAE. Under the treaty they are just as good Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his point of order?

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 300 Indian pupils at Albuquerque, N. Mex., $50,100; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,700; for erection of ice plant, $3,000; general repairs and improvements, $1,500; in all, $56,300.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to propose an amendment to the paragraph. In line 21 strike out "fifty" and insert "forty;" also in line 25 strike out "fifty-six" and insert "forty-six." That is diminishing the appropriation $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 37, line 21, strike out "fifty" and insert "forty."
In line 25 strike out "fifty-six" and insert "forty-six."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment. I suppose the gentleman desires to advocate it. I simply want to say the gentleman's proposition is to arbitrarily decrease the amount of the appropriation. It has been found from long experience that $167 per capita, which is appropriated for the support of pupils in these Indian schools, in the ordinary school is none too great. In the larger schools, like Haskell and Carlisle, it has been found that they can be maintained for less. The $167 provides not only for housing, but the clothing and food and books, and if there is any surplus unexpended it is turned back into the Treasury. One hundred and sixty-seven dollars per capita has been found by long experience to be not too great to maintain a school save the very large ones; and I trust, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will not prevail.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to some official figures in the report of the Commissioner of Education for the years 1899 and 1900, in which he says that the average expenditure per pupil for the white pupils of the United States is $20.29. Now, it is not the disparity of expense alone to which I call attention. This is one of the reservation schools. I really believe it will be conceded by all the members——

Mr. SHERMAN. Albuquerque is not a reservation school. It is a nonreservation boarding school.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to call attention to some figures in regard to it. It is a so-called industrial school. On page 414 the superintendent of this school says:

This school is situated in a temperate climate, and is in a generally satisfactory condition. The literary work is carried on in a satisfactory manner, but I would like to see better provision made for the teaching of industries, especially blacksmithing.

The local superintendent says on pages 546 and 547:

I have insisted throughout the year upon constant and uninterrupted work in all departments and upon the closest attention to details of instruction. Have made a special effort to impress the importance of industrial training by having the industrial departments alternate with the school in giving frequent exhibitions, before the whole school, of the recitations and work which they were each doing and by having a regular course of study prepared for each industrial department, enforcing systematic instruction therein, and also, wherever possible, having those subjects treated in the industrial departments, also used for lessons in the schoolrooms. Our industrial exhibitions proved very entertaining and were a great surprise both to pupils and employees.

It will be noticed that this is no summer school, nor is it a winter school. It is a school, according to the report on page 679, where pupils attend for twelve months. Let us note the value of the products raised by the pupils, over 300 in number. It was $789.70, and this with all the appliances of the school and with elaborate instruction in farming. It is claimed that practical education is the substance of their instruction, yet those receiving the benefits of all these efforts show about $2.50 a head as the result of this industrial training. It seems to me this is a very impressive lesson upon the value of the whole system.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support and education of 200 Indian pupils at Chamberlain, S. Dak., $33,400; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,600; for general repairs and improvements, $2,200; in all, $37,200.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, line 5, after the word "dollars," insert "for additional buildings and improvements to complete plant, $16,000." In line 6, following, strike out the word "thirty-seven" and insert the word "fifty-three."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, Mr. Chairman, no point of order lies.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has not stated his point of order.

Mr. BURTON. The point of order, Mr. Chairman, is that it is for the completion of work not authorized by statute or by any recommendation of the executive department. There is nothing to show any recommendation of the executive department or that any further building is required.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is an additional appropriation to complete a building already provided for. The facts are that Congress appropriated $40,000 for the purpose of increasing the Chamberlain school. Plans and specifications were made, and bids were advertised for, and the lowest bid received was $43,495, or nearly $4,000 more than the amount available.

The plans have been pared to the last degree, so the Department states, and it is impossible to reduce them without emasculating them; and as it is presumed Congress contemplated, when it gave the appropriation, to increase the size of the school, this sum of $16,000, in view of the rise in price of material and the fluctuating market, will allow a safe margin to develop the plant and round out by completion of the employees' quarters, the dairy building, addition to laundry, and addition to the hospital. So this appropriation is for the completion of the building already authorized by Congress, and which can not be constructed for the amount appropriated, and, second, for additional buildings necessary for the completion of the plant. It is for the completion of a work already in progress.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York how provision can be asked for the support and maintenance of this school if the buildings are not complete?

Mr. SHERMAN. These are for additional buildings. There is a school there, and has been for many years. Last year an appropriation was made for an additional building. That building was not constructed for the reason that when advertisements were made for bids no bid was submitted within the appropriation.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York how many of these nonreservation schools there are in South Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Four in South Dakota.

Mr. BURTON. Would not the purpose of education be subserved better by one central school than by four small ones?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think perhaps that might be so. It would involve an additional expenditure so far as transportation of pupils and supplies is concerned. I think it would be better had the original school plant been enlarged instead of the new and additional schools established; but they have been established and they are there, and the Indian school population in South Dakota is greater than the school population in any other State in the Union.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just a word in relation to these schools and several other nonreservation schools in South Dakota. It is a fact that South Dakota has a larger Indian population than any other State in the Union. We have seven separate and distinct Indian reservations. We have four nonreservation schools, located in different parts of the State, all of them located adjacent or close to different Indian reservations. As an illustration, the Chamberlain School is located at a point where the Crow, Crow Creek, Yankton, and Rosebud reservations are tributary.

Now, the Chamberlain School has been in operation for several years. Congress, in the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, made an appropriation of $20,000 to enlarge the plant and increase the capacity of the school. In the first session of this Congress an additional appropriation of $20,000 was made to carry out the plans that had been formulated for the enlargement of this institution, and this $16,000 is simply to round out and complete that plant, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of 150 pupils at the training school at Cherokee, N. C., $25,050; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,500; for general repairs and improvements, $2,000; for heating plant, $2,500; additional for girls' dormitory, $5,000; for lighting plant, $2,500; for additional school farm, $3,500; in all, $42,050.

Mr. BURTON. I will ask the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to state what rule is followed with reference to the establishment of separate lighting plants for these schools. I see that in some cases there is provision for an electric-lighting plant, and in other cases there is not.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no fixed rule that we have followed. Recommendations began some half dozen years or more ago for electric-lighting plants.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

The committee, not wishing to increase the amount of the appropriation bill by providing everywhere for these electric plants in the same year, yet believing that the additional safety gained by having the buildings lighted by electricity rather than by coal oil or by local gas lamps was sufficient to warrant the additional expenditure, have, when the recommendations have come in properly sustained by evidence, recommended the establishment of electric-lighting plants at one school after another. I can not state from memory what particular schools are now thus equipped and what not, but I should say that about one-half of these schools are now equipped with electric plants—possibly more. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., for transportation of pupils to and from said school, and for general repairs and improvements, $157,000; for additional salary of any military officer of Carlisle Indian School while acting as superintendent of said school, $1,000; in all, $158,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I should like the gentleman from New York to state whether this is the total expense for maintenance of this school.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is.

Mr. BURTON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is included in this case the item for transportation of pupils to and from the school, while in another part of the bill there is a separate general appropriation made for transportation, which, I believe, is this year increased——

Mr. SHERMAN. By $10,000.

Mr. BURTON. The sum now recommended is $50,000. What is the occasion for that?

Mr. SHERMAN. At Carlisle it has been found that it requires less per capita to support the pupils than it does at certain other schools; and it was found that by changing the wording of the section relating to that school so as to make the one item cover all expenditures the superintendent would be able, from his appropriation, to pay for the transportation of all his pupils to and from the school, and able also, as he does, to maintain at the school a number of pupils largely in excess of the number that would be covered by an appropriation of $167 each, the additional number being something over 100. In figuring this out, we can not take the whole sum on the basis of that per capita, because there is some portion of it that must be used for repairs of one kind and another, and some portion that must be used for transportation.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 23, page 28, the following:

"Provided, That on and after the passage of this act 50 children of citizens of Porto Rico shall be eligible to admission as students at the Indian Industrial School at Carlisle under the same rules and regulations as the scholars now admitted to said institution."

Mr. CANNON. I make a point of order upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LACEY. I hope the gentleman will simply reserve the point of order. I think that when he hears the facts he will withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. There is so much confusion that the Chair does not understand whether the gentleman from Illinois simply reserves the point of order or makes it.

Mr. CANNON. Most certainly I make the point of order; but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] asks me to reserve it, as he wants to submit some remarks, and I always want to be courteous.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that if I can get the attention of my friend from Illinois he will withdraw the point of order.

There are to-day 42 Porto Rican children in that school. This proposition is to legalize such pupils to the number of 50—to provide for bringing 50 of those children to this institution, giving them opportunities of industrial education upon this continent, surrounded by American influences, learning to speak our language. This will be of incalculable advantage to these children upon their return to Porto Rico. Forty-two have been already admitted in this way, and this proposition is to legalize the admission of 50.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. By what authority have those children been admitted?

Mr. LACEY. They have been admitted under the general law.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What general law admits Porto Rican children to Carlisle?

Mr. LACEY. There is some question about that, I concede. This is a general proposition to legalize their admission, and to extend the number up to fifty, which is a very small number. It seems to me a very appropriate thing to do. The Porto Ricans are at our doors. There are a million of inhabitants in that island, and the admission of 50 of these boys and girls from Porto Rico would be of very great advantage to them as teachers in the training that they would get and for the use that they would be to their neighbors on their return to that island.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for unanimous consent just to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will withhold its ruling for the present.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, what I want to say is not strictly in order, but it is thoroughly responsive to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. No man has more respect for the judgment of the gentleman than I have. I make the point of order for the reason that this whole question of the education of Indian children or anybody else without effort upon the part of the parents of those children—our taking them and educating them above the level of the surroundings where they use that education to support themselves and where they can not be sustained at home, is, in my judgment, a mistake—almost a crime. Great blocks of human beings progress from the ground, where they have a firm foundation, utilizing that which they have, living in the sweat of their faces, holding what they achieve, and progressing from one generation to another by their own efforts. But the taking of children and at public expense educating them above the sentiment of the people from whom they sprang and with whom they must live is demoralizing and pauperizing. It is cruelty to the individual and pauperizing to the people. We all appreciate that which costs us something.

Now, here is a proposition to run this same system in Porto Rico, an island of a million of people. There they have a civilization. Through the centuries, under our laws, they have a good chance to progress, but they must progress and grow working out their own salvation, with their surroundings, and they will thus be competent to support themselves and make their way. I would rather have one foot of progress in a generation, where that progress is achieved amongst the people themselves, than the expenditure of multiplied millions of dollars used in transporting these children—and it would come to that in the end if you make the beginning now—to the United States, educating them here as we have been educating these Indian children, and then sending them back where they would not receive support. I make this point of order because this whole experiment with the Indian children has worked disastrously, and I do not want to inflict an outrage upon the Porto Ricans.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. It is new legislation. It provides that from and after the passage of this act certain children not now permitted to enter this school may become inmates of it. It even goes beyond the enactment in relation to the Indian children at the same school.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph just read, for the purpose of securing the floor just a few minutes to reply to some observations of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. In the first place, I venture to suggest, speaking now of the American Indians, and not of the Porto Ricans, that they do not make much progression in the tribes and in the tribal relations in which they live; and secondly, that a great majority of the Indian pupils educated at the Carlisle Indian school do not go back to those tribes. They are not supported for a time at Government expense and then sent back to their tribes with no support. On the contrary, in this most excellent institution—of which I happen to know something, as it exists within 18 miles of the city in which I live—they are educated to support themselves, to take their places among and compete with white people, white mechanics, and to enter and live in the homes of white people. I hold in my hand a paper published by Indian apprentices at the Carlisle School, containing a copy of a speech made on the 8th of this month by Colonel Pratt, the superintendent of this institution, at Wilmington, Del.

In that speech he stated that within 80 miles of that city there were living, and it would be practical upon short notice to gather in Wilmington, over 200 pupils who had graduated from the Carlisle Indian school. They were living among white people, in white families, attending public schools or working at trades. In his report to the Department of Internal Affairs, he states what became of the last graduating class of 18. Two of them are blacksmiths, one is a carpenter, two of them are now making $20 a week, and so on, distributed among the various trades—one is a telegraph operator for the Gettysburg and Harrisburg Railroad Company. Thirty-four of these Carlisle Indians served in the Spanish-American war and made most excellent soldiers; seven enlisted in the Navy. Some of them, after leaving the Indian school, have since graduated at Dickinson College.

The location of this school is most excellent. It is in the beautiful and healthful Cumberland Valley, within 18 miles from Harrisburg and within the limits of or adjoining the borough of Carlisle, a college town, in which are located Dickinson College and other well-known institutions of learning. The country round about embraces some of the finest agricultural lands in the world. People in that vicinity are honest, frugal, and industrious. No better surroundings, no better examples for the Indian could be found. At least one of these Indian graduates is now attending the law school connected with Dickinson College.

I have upon my desk the latest official report from this school, of which I have been able to obtain a copy this morning. It is dated October 8, 1900. It states, among other things, that during the year ending June 30, 1900, Indian pupils earned during periods of outing which were allowed them $27,255.52, which shows that they are trained to industry. The savings of pupils to June 30, 1900, amounted to $15,518.39, which shows that they are not unacquainted with frugality.

Our greatest institutions of learning consider that athletic games, notably football, constitute a very important element in the training of youth. Where will you find a football team selected from among so small a number of pupils which has more distinguished itself than the Carlisle Indian team? The great universities and colleges, including Yale, Harvard, Columbia, Cornell, and the University of Pennsylvania have found these Indian boys "foemen worthy of their steel."

These boys have a magnificent band of music of sixty pieces, which, if they came in competition, would keep the Marine Band of Washington busy to retain its laurels. On the occasion of the inauguration of Governor Pennypacker on the 20th of this month six companies of Indian cadets marched in the parade behind their own band, presenting an instructive and inspiring spectacle which I wish might have been seen by every member of this House. Finer boys, with more soldierly bearing or precision of marching, can not be found anywhere. I have not the slightest doubt that if the time of need should come these Indian cadets will be found brave, intelligent, and hardy soldiers.

The education secured at this school is of the most practical character. These boys and girls are taught how to make a living, how to live among and be useful to white people, how to become self-supporting and useful citizens, instead of living upon the bounty of the Government.

Col. R. H. Pratt, the superintendent of this school, is the right man in the right place. No better could be selected. A man of great intelligence and fine executive ability, he devotes his every energy to the building up of this institution and to the care and practical training of the boys and girls under his charge. He served as a soldier during the civil war and in Indian campaigns. He knows the temperament, the habits, and the capabilities of the Indian. He considers it best, as far as possible, by education and training of the young to draw them away from the reservations, to break up their tribal relations, and to qualify them to mingle with and make their living among the white race.

In my judgment, there never was an educational institution doing a greater work for the country and rendering more value for the money expended upon it than this Carlisle Indian Industrial School.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word by way of opposition to this formal amendment, merely to have an excuse to say what I desire to say.

I have made no attack upon the Carlisle school, and I am more than delighted, as long as we have that school educating these Indian children, so that they will be competent to make a living, if they will stay away from the reservations, to take on citizenship and compete with our people. That is a good thing for the individuals, because they have the surrounding and the encouragement that is on all fours with the education. I am glad to know that that is becoming the rule. Formerly it was not. Twenty years ago in the main they went back to the reservations, and when they got back, after a few months they had the vices of our civilization without the virtues of their own. It was the height of cruelty to send them back. I hope not another one will be sent back.

I thought it proper to say that much and to express my pleasure that a new rule had been adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I renew the motion to strike out that section. I am struck with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has so forcefully said. For fifteen years on this floor I have been a witness of what I conceive to be the veriest folly on the face of the earth in the attempted education of the Indian. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] holds up with pride a newspaper published by some Indian pupils. I had rather see one corn row plowed in the West by an Indian in the sight of the other Indians who are idle than to see them running the New York Daily Sun. It would mean more for Indian progress, it would mean more of common sense. You apply a rule to them that is absolutely different from that applied to every other people since the dawn of time.

What do you do with them when you take them to Carlisle? There are poor boys in every State in this Union and in every Congressional district, white boys, your own flesh and blood, poorer than the Indian himself, who would like to have one dollar spent for their education where one hundred dollars is spent under this bill. This is an effort to bring a lot of Indians from the West against their consent, put them in a strange environment, in a civilization high above them, which their tribe will not attain under the best conditions in the next century and a half, and you are only frittering away the money in a humane chase after a dream. How are you going to educate the Indian? I have been accused of being his enemy.

I tell you that when the first steam locomotive went through the Apache Reservation in Arizona more was done for Indian education generally than the Carlisle school will do in the next century. There has been no Indian outbreak since. The Indians have been taught to work on the railroads and receive the money for it, and if you will keep this simple fact in mind that every man must find the necessity of an education before the education will do him any good, if you will appropriate money for industrial schools, if you will put them on the reservation, if you will make it, as the gentleman from Illinois wisely says, a lesson so that the great tribe will raise itself one foot, you will be doing more than if you make Henry Clays and Daniel Websters out of a dozen individuals. It is folly. Every dollar of it is thrown away. It is observed by every man who knows a thing about the question. Good people go around and look at the combed up and well dressed Indians at Carlisle, and talk about the wonderful improvement of the Apache Indians.

The Carlisle school has never raised a single one of these Indian tribes on the reservation a single inch above their low level since the Carlisle school has been established, and it never will. The gentleman says there are Filipinos there now. What is this Carlisle school? Is it an eleemosynary institution for the education of everybody not white who has not money enough to educate himself? How many men who honor seats on this floor in achieving their present positions have had to struggle through environments as hard as any Indians at the Carlisle school ever had to struggle through? Yet they had none of these advantages to get an education.

Again I have made the proposition to strike this provision out. I have had it struck out time and time again, only to have it replaced by the Senate. You can not change the Indian in that way. This is a wasteful expenditure of money, and it could be more profitably used in many ways by having their education on the reservation; but you want to do something for these poor people, and you teach him psalm singing and the good doctrines of religion, and you teach him music, perhaps, when he does not know how to wrap an orange for market or how to run a furrow through a cornfield.

You bring him to Carlisle and you educate him in a trade and you put him right in competition with the poor boy here, raised in your own community. You put a plane and a hammer in his hand and put him in competition with the boy raised in your community, who has acquired his trade without one dollar to help him—and that is your idea of education at Carlisle. It is nothing more than nonsense, and the whole scheme a fraud. I protest in vain against this folly. Go on with it if you will. Tax poor white people for this visionary benefit, but at the end you will find that you have made a few discontented, overeducated Indians and further impoverished parents of white children unable to buy a schoolbook. I repeat that the whole business is a fraud, and this item should be struck forever from the bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment. I desire to say a few words in opposition to this proposition to strike out this paragraph making an appropriation to continue the Indian Industrial School at Carlisle. It may be better, as the gentleman from Arizona suggests, that all Indians shall be kept in degradation and none of them permitted to receive an education until he himself sees the necessity for it. It is seldom that an ignorant tribe or person sees the necessity for an education, and upon the gentleman's theory no Indian would ever receive any kind of education. But that is not the plan, that is not the principle upon which the white children are treated, or upon which the colored children are treated, in the United States. We have common schools supported at the public expense for the education of white and colored children. In some States we have compulsory education laws. Dense ignorance is not considered compatible with the public interest. Why not do something for the practical education of these wards of the nation, these Indian children? I utterly deny, and the statistics and official reports repudiate, the statement of the gentleman that these pupils are taught psalm singing, while so neglected in more practical matters that they can not, as he says, even wrap an orange. We do not raise oranges in that part of the country; but they are taught to plow the furrow, to be blacksmiths, carpenters, bricklayers, shoemakers, stone masons—in short, they are taught all the ordinary trades and occupations.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Why are they not taught that on the reservations, and let Carlisle alone? Why not let this be done where others can see it? Can not you do the same on the reservation as you do at the Carlisle school?

Mr. OLMSTED. I perfectly agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and with Colonel Pratt, the superintendent of this school, that the more you can separate the Indians and get them away from their tribal relations the better for them, the better for the country, and the better for the United States Treasury. These very Indians at Carlisle, during their months of outing the last year for which we have a report, earned more than $27,000 in wages at various occupations. The girls are taught to make their own dresses; they are taught to wash clothes, to cook, and other essentials of housekeeping, and prepared for useful avocations open to their sex. The boys, as I have said, are taught blacksmithing, carpentering, and other useful occupations. They are not sent back to their tribes any further than can be helped, because the superintendent of the school agrees with the gentleman from Illinois that they ought to be kept away from them and encouraged to mingle with the white people. That is the policy pursued at Carlisle.

I will suggest to the gentleman from Arizona another reason why this paragraph should not be stricken out. It provides for the cheapest education that is afforded by any provision in this bill. There are over 1,400 pupils in that school at this time and yet the whole appropriation called for is only $158,000, including transportation, general repairs and improvements to buildings, as well as food, clothing, and teachers for these 1,400 boys and girls. In other schools on the reservations the appropriations are at the rate of $167 per capita. In other words, while upon the reservations 1,400 pupils require $233,800, Carlisle requires only $158,000. It is in the interest of economy, as well as desirable and important for the other reasons I have stated, that this school at Carlisle shall be continued and that this paragraph shall remain in the bill. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support of 600 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Chilocco, Okla., $100,200; for pay of superintendent at said school, $2,250; for general repairs and improvements, $10,000; for addition to boys' dormitory, $12,000; for horse barn, $10,000; for laundry building, $5,000; for cottages, $4,000; in all, $143,450.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out the portion of the paragraph beginning with line 15, "for laundry building," down to the end of the paragraph. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is the policy of the Indian Department to maintain laundries for these schools, buying machinery operated by steam, thereby relieving the pupils of the necessity of doing this work?

Mr. SHERMAN. The steam laundries are established at most of these large schools. It seems to be necessary where you have six or seven hundred pupils that you should have some means of doing this work other than by hand.

This is a question which the Indian Committee have had under consideration in the recent past, and an amendment has been prepared and will be submitted at the proper place in the bill to cover all the schools, providing that so much of the laundry work shall be done by hand as will teach the female pupils of sufficient age the art of hand laundry work. But it seems to me the gentleman from Ohio must be impressed with the fact that it is not practicable to do all the laundry work by hand for 600 or 1,000 pupils. In some smaller schools it might be practicable to do all the work by hand. Here you have 600 pupils. How are you to do it? Are you to have 50 or 100 tubs, and 50 or 100 students working side by side in one day, or are you to distribute it over the week and have a part of the laundry work done every day? Practically, it seems to me, by the amendment that we shall offer later, providing that so much of the work shall be done as will teach these girls the art of laundry by hand, we have accomplished the purpose of the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman from New York yield to a further question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Has there been any instruction in this line heretofore?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; not only in the past year, but we have always given instruction in laundry work in all of these schools.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 375 Indian pupils at the Riggs Institute, Flandreau, S. Dak., and transportation, $65,625; for general repairs and improvements, $3,000; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,800; for two lavatories, $2,000; for coal storeroom, $1,500; in all, $73,925.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39 add, in line 24, after the word "dollars," these amounts: "For amount for brick industrial shop, $2,500, in addition to $4,000 heretofore appropriated. For amount for brick office and warehouse, $2,000, in addition to $4,000 heretofore appropriated."

Line 34, page 39, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "eight." Strike out the word "nine" and insert the word "four."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 200 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Fort Mojave, Ariz., $83,400; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,600; for general repairs and improvements, $2,000; for dining room and kitchen, $20,000; in all, $57,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 5 and 6, "for the dining room and kitchen, $20,000." I would like to ask the gentleman upon what scale these expenditures were calculated.

Mr. SHERMAN. The superintendent of this school reports that the present dining room and kitchen is an old adobe building, that it is badly ventilated, and that a complete building adequate for the purpose would cost about $20,000; that lumber and wages in that section of the country are extremely high.

Mr. BURTON. It is evident, Mr. Chairman, that we shall make no progress and oppose no check in these large expenditures unless we begin somewhere. It seems to me that $20,000 for an item of that kind at a school in which there are only 170 enrolled is very extravagant.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is expected that there will be 200 pupils in this school.

Mr. BURTON. They have not succeeded in gathering that number yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. The average enrollment last year was 173. I understand that the school population is such that they can reasonably expect 200 pupils will attend as soon as the buildings are ready to accommodate them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was considered and disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 300 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Genoa, Nebr., $50,100; for general repairs and improvements, $5,000; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,700; for horse barn, $2,500; for water system, $6,000; in all, $65,300.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words in lines 19 and 20, page 40, "for water system, $6,000."

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In lines 19 and 20 strike out the words "for water system, $6,000."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed that there is a more elaborate system of minor improvements, electric lights, lavatories, waterworks, etc., than can be found in any college in the United States. We are here crowding around these buildings these different conveniences which are regarded in other places as luxuries—electric-light plants, waterworks, and all these various utilities, some of which, no doubt, ought to be furnished from public or private sources outside. In this particular instance I have received information that there is an ample supply of water from waterworks in the town of Genoa.

I want to refer to the report of this school, which will be found on page 544 of the report for 1901. It says: "A system of fire protection has been put in this summer. It consists of a standpipe and necessary hose and racks for each story of the boys' building and the girls' building, the kitchen, and the dining room." Very many schools in this country would regard themselves as fortunate if they had these appliances. "I hope soon to extend it to the shop, school building, and laundry. Three hundred and twenty-five pupils are in attendance, so we can organize and go ahead. We hope to have the school building, hospital, and dairy barn completed this year."

Here is a school with an attendance of 300 pupils. Earlier in the report the superintendent says: "I took charge of the school February 16, 1901. On account of the small attendance it was necessary to rustle for 50 pupils."

It seems that he got them. I trust the members of the committee will not oppose this amendment. If this school is entitled to electric lights and hospital and all these improvements, if Indians are entitled to them, certainly the white race are entitled to them also.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have a report from the school to which the gentleman refers, in which it says that the water supply is furnished by the Genoa Water Company. The source is extremely bad and the water impure. The supply is insufficient and precarious, and the town itself has an insufficient water supply. It is said that the water plant is badly used and needs repairing, and that it has gone down very much within the past year. The agent recommends that a new water system be supplied for the school, and if it is not provided it will not be long before an outbreak of typhoid fever will be had at this school. This is an important matter, and the sum of $6,000 is necessary so that these conditions can be removed as soon as possible.

Mr. BURTON. What is the date of that report?

Mr. SHERMAN. It has come to me within the last month. It is a report made in the late fall.

Mr. CANNON. How large a place is Genoa?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ROBINSON] to answer that question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. Genoa has about 1,000 inhabitants.

Mr. CANNON. How many pupils are there at this school?

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. Three hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. CANNON. Can we not do something for the poor 1,000 people of Genoa who are threatened with typhoid fever? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. They do not ask it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, there are now about 325 Indian pupils at this school. It is near to the reservation from which these Indian pupils are received. The school has for some years obtained its water supply from the village of Genoa. It was agreed, at the time the waterworks were put in, that the school should be supplied with water at a flat rate of $700 per annum. Last year, according to information I have received from the Indian Commissioner, the demand was made upon the Indian Department that the system previously prevailing should be changed, and that the water should be charged for at a rate in accordance with the quantity used. A water meter was put in, and last November, according to the registry of this meter, the amount charged this Indian school, if that rate be allowed to prevail, would be $108 per month.

Mr. HULL. Would it not cost a great deal more than that to operate an independent plant?

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. It would not, I understand, cost any more to operate an independent plant, because they already have the engineer and other officers.

Mr. HULL. I think the gentleman did not apprehend my question. What I wanted to know was whether it would not cost the school more than $100 a month to operate an independent plant.

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. By no means. It could not.

Mr. HULL. How about the engineer and other officers necessary to take charge of the works?

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. They have now an engineer for the steam-heating plant, and also a janitor and fireman, and all the skilled help that would be required. As I understand, the desire is simply on the part of the city of Genoa to require the Government through its Indian school to bear a large part of the expense of running the waterworks.

Now, these wells out of which the water is drawn are shallow; and the report, which I ask to have read, is that under the plan proposed the school would have no adequate protection in case of fire, on account of a possible deficiency of the water supply. I ask the Clerk to read the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Excerpt from report of Special United States Indian Agent Eugene MacComas on the Genoa Indian School, dated Genoa, Nebr., March 6, 1902.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 27, 1903.

The water supply of the school is quite a serious problem. Water is now obtained from the town of Genoa at an annual rental of $700, regardless of quantity used. There has been no written contract with the town for several years, and while I was at the school notice was served on the superintendent that the town was dissatisfied with the rental and that unless other arrangements were made by April 1 the supply would be shut off. The superintendent and I attended a meeting of the town board and discussed their proposition of measuring the water by meter and charging therefor at the rate of 10 cents per 1,000 gallons, with the result that the board agreed in writing to extend the time of cutting off the supply until July 1, 1902, and in the meantime, if the Department agreed to the proposition, they would place a standard meter in operation, stipulating, however, that the school must pay the same amount of money from April 1 to July 1, 1902, as the meter registers for the first quarter it is in use. It is believed at the school that the meter rate will not increase the present cost of the water.

I investigated the town waterworks and found the supply to be quite limited, and the well from which it is drawn in a most undesirable location, being in a very low part of the town and surrounded by a number of barns and privy vaults. The water must of necessity be contaminated, and may at any time cause sickness at the school. Wells should be dug at the school and a tank erected, and with the central heating plant the water can be pumped without additional cost. The original cost of providing the school with its own water plant would soon be covered by the rental now paid being saved, after which time it would be of no expense. Until this can be done of course the meter rate will have to be paid to the town of Genoa. The town board expect that the meter rate will increase the revenue from the school, and if it proves that the 10-cent rate does not do this they may at any time increase the rate. While such an arrangement exists the school will be at the mercy of the town, and this, too, for impure water, so that sooner or later the school will have to have its own water plant, and I strongly advise that it be given this at once.

[Excerpt from report of United States Supervisor Indian Schools Albert O. Wright, on the Genoa Indian School, dated April 24, 1902.]

The water supply is now obtained from the village. As usual the rate is too high, the authorities thinking that the Government will have to take it. The wells from which the water is drawn are shallow wells in the center of the village, liable to be contaminated by the privies and stables near them. The water is pumped up to a reservoir on the hill and here gains force enough for ample fire protection.

You have already been fully informed by Special Agent MacComas on this question. After examining the situation personally, I think that it would be advisable for the Government to own its own water supply here. There will be no difficulty in securing wells at little depth. Being out of town, the wells need not be subject to contamination. The water can be forced up to proper height for fire protection either by an elevated tank, or perferably by a reservoir on the hill half a mile or less distant. The latter would involve purchasing a small site for such reservoir, which can easily be done.

An additional advantage of such a supply is that the water can be sure to be on hand when wanted for fire protection, of which there is no certainty under the village management, and that extra water can be pumped for watering the garden in dry times without much extra cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ROBINSON] has expired.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter that does not arise in my district, and I do not know that I ought to say anything about it. But I am going to tell the House something in regard to a communication that I have received from a gentleman who, I understand, is a member of the city board of the town of Genoa. As has been said, this is a small town which has not been able to support independently a water system; so a few years ago, as I understand, the town erected a city waterworks, with a sort of understanding that they would get for their water plant the patronage of the Indian school; and they have been supplying that school, as my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska] has stated, at $700 a year.

Some time last winter, as my informant tells me, the Indians persisted in turning the water loose to make a skating pond; and there was consequently some conflict between the city authorities and the Indian school authorities as to whether there was any right to do this under the contract to supply water at a flat rate. Finally the city authorities made an agreement to furnish water to the school at 10 cents per thousand gallons. In my city the rate is 15 cents per thousand. I do not know what the rate is elsewhere, but 10 cents per thousand is about two-thirds of the rate charged for water in my town.

As I was saying, November being a cold month, the school had its skating rink, and it cost $108 a month. In short, as I gather from the letter which I have received (I am sorry that, not expecting this matter to come up, I did not bring it with me that it might be read), there seems to be a conflict between the superintendent and the city authorities; and so there comes to us a recommendation to build a separate water plant for the Indian school.

Now, in answer to the statement that is made somewhere—I think possibly by my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON—that the water supply was inadequate, he also writes me that they have just borrowed $3,500 and were just completing some more additions—I do not know when these reports came in—that have been referred to as showing an insufficiency of supply, so that there will be no question about the adequacy of the water supply. In short, he writes that they have built the water plant depending on this revenue from the Government there to help them along, as they could not sustain it in the town without it. He further writes that so far as the town itself is concerned it does not want the Government to put this money in. I am in a somewhat peculiar position. I do not like to oppose a proposition of expending $6,000 Government money in my State, yet since they have asked me to say that much, I have said it, that the city people there do not want this waterworks system erected in this Indian school.

Mr. ROBINSON of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in reply to what has been said that it is well stated that this does not come in the district represented by the gentleman who just took his seat. It comes in the Third district, which I have the honor to represent. The animus of this whole thing is displayed in the fact that someone, some where, has written to some one or has urged upon someone that he look after their interests and not after the interests of the Government or of the Indian schools. Now, the truth of the matter is that a rate of $700 per annum, where only 350 people inhabit a school, is the highest rate that is charged in any city anywhere in the United States.

There is no place where $2 per head is charged for every inmate of any home or institution in the whole country, and the statement made under the meter system of last November, wherein it is claimed, or at least insinuated, that the inmates of the Indian school had flooded some kind of park as a skating rink, is pure hearsay. There is nothing here from the Indian Department or anywhere else except a faint rumor of such a thing. But it is a fact that during November it registered $108, and since that time there has been no report received by the Department. Now, I will say, so far as the gentleman is concerned, that I appreciate any assistance he may give me in looking after the interests of the people of the Third district of Nebraska, but I would rather that the attitude assumed by him should be backed up by some of the reports made by the official inspectors who are to look after these matters, and not come from the selfish standpoint of those who desire to hold up the Government. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support and education of 125 pupils at the Indian school at Hayward, Wis., $20,875; pay of superintendent, $1,300; general repairs and improvements, $2,000; in all, $24,175.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following amendment as a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, page 41, and insert:

"For support and education of 175 pupils at the Indian school at Hayward, Wis., $29,225; for pay of superintendent, $1,300; general repairs and improvements, $2,000; for erection of hospital, $5,000; for erection of employees' quarters, $4,000; in all, $41,525: Provided, That if, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it becomes necessary to continue at said school an excess of pupils over 125 for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, there is hereby appropriated therefor, to be immediately available, not exceeding $8,350."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the following letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relating to this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 22, 1903.

Hon. J. S. SHERMAN,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Referring to pages 22 and 23 of the memorandum handed you relative to Indian school estimates, it will be observed that I call attention to a recent report made by Supervisor of Indian Schools J. F. House upon the Hayward Indian School, Wisconsin. He directs attention to the fact that the principal need of the school is a hospital building. As you will note, this was not included in the annual estimates, as this report of Supervisor House was filed subsequent to the rendition of the same.

Mr. House says there has been a good deal of sickness at the school; that it has a large enrollment, and if an epidemic of mumps, scarlet fever, diphtheria, or other diseases incident to children should break out at this school there would be no means of isolating patients. He is of opinion that a hospital should by all means be provided for the school. I would suggest, therefore, that an item of $5,000 be added to the appropriation for a hospital building.

As the enrollment at this school has so materially increased over and above that which was anticipated when the plant was constructed, the agent, who is now in the city, has personally directed my attention to the necessity for additional quarters. I therefore suggest that an item of $4,000 be added to the appropriation for the erection of an employees' quarters.

I also desire to direct attention to the fact that the Hayward School during its first year's existence had a very precarious attendance, and did not justify this office at the time the estimates were made up to recommend any increase, in view of the number of pupils. Its enrollment and average attendance is now 150, and I am informed by the agent that he has every reasonable ground to believe that during the next year the attendance can be maintained at from 175 to 200. Of course he will not be able to maintain this number of pupils on his appropriation for 125, and it would be bad policy to send these pupils back after they have requested admission into the school. To that end, therefore, I would earnestly recommend that the item for the Indian school at Hayward, Wis., as the same appears on page 41 of H. R. 15894, reported by you on December 9, be changed from line 8 to 14, as follows:

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether it is the policy of the committee to recommend the building of hospitals at all these nonreservation schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are hospitals at most of the schools already.

Mr. BURTON. Is it also the policy to build them at reservation schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. At some there are hospitals and at some there are not. The gentleman will understand that a very large number of the schools are day schools, and besides that, being reservation schools, there are hospitals at nearly all of the agencies, and the agency hospital does away with the necessity for having an additional school hospital.

Mr. BURTON. What is the expense of maintaining a physician in one of these nonreservation school hospitals?

Mr. SHERMAN. It varies. I should say it would not be to exceed $500—three, four, and five hundred dollars.

Mr. BURTON. May I have a further question? Is it contemplated that a special physician will be engaged to take care of this hospital, or is medical attendance secured by contract or other arrangement with some local physician?

Mr. SHERMAN. Generally a contract is made with some local physician.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 709 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Phoenix, Ariz., $116,900; for general repairs and improvements, $12,000; for pay of superintendent at said school, $2,250; addition to hospital, $3,000; for cold storage, $5,000; electric lighting, $7,000; water system, $7,500; in all, $153,650.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out that portion in lines 3 to 6, of page 43, beginning with the words "for cold storage, $5,000," and ending with the words "water system, $7,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Let the amendment be read at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43 strike out the words beginning with "for cold storage," in lines 3 and 4, down to and including the first word, "dollars," in line 6.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to hear from the gentleman as to why that should be stricken out. This is in Arizona and that is a very warm country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can explain why it should not be stricken out, if anybody desires to hear it, but I do not care to occupy time to explain unless somebody desires to hear me.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I offer the following amendment to that section.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43, line 4, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "four;" and after the word "dollars," in line 5, insert the words "no part of which sum shall be used in installing any electric plant;" in line 6 strike out "fifty-three" and insert "forty-nine."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, the object of that is simply to prevent the attempt to install an electric plant at the Indian school at Phoenix, Ariz. I wish to say to the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERMAN] that I understand from inquiry at the Indian Office that the purpose was to use this $7,000 in an attempt to establish an electric plant at that school. It is an enormous institution, with a great number of houses, and the $7,000 will do no good in the world toward the installation of an electric plant. The only interest I have in the world in this matter is what I find in a letter sent to me by the Phoenix Light and Fuel Company, that gives the exact history of this thing, and it is in response to a letter which I wrote to the president of that company, telling him that they were speaking of installing an electric plant because a charge of $4,000 a year was made for maintaining the electric plant. In response to that he sends the following letter, which explains the case. I hope the members will give their attention to this letter and will see the necessity of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHOENIX LIGHT AND FUEL COMPANY,
Phoenix, Ariz., January 16, 1903.

Hon. M. A. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: Yours of the 10th instant at hand and carefully noted. I very much dislike to bother you with these matters, but it seems our representative in Washington is the only one we can call upon in the matter.

I am somewhat surprised at the amount they charge, namely, $4,000, for lighting the Indian school for a year. Our light bill for 1901 was $1,806.35; our light bill for 1902 was $2,413.70, running as high in the month of December, 1901, as $281.48, and as low in the month of August, for the month, as $79.06. Our bill for December, 1902, was $393.66, and for July, 1902, $83.34 for the month.

The current used in the summer months is quite largely used for fan service in the daytime. This makes a gross cost of $4,220.05 for lighting the school for two years, or $2,110.02 per year.

The reason of the increase for 1902 over 1901 is that they have added several large buildings, and I understand that there is an appropriation for still further buildings.

They have also installed some 16 horsepower in motors for pumping, running laundry, printing press, etc., and it must be this additional service of power and increased lighting of buildings which causes the superintendent to ask for an appropriation of $4,000. Even then it is cheaper than the Government putting up steam plants and buying and hauling coal. They have a steam plant there now, and out of the three boilers only one of them is fit to use, the others being out of use from hard usage; but that is neither here nor there.

They can not purchase coal and run electricity as cheap as we can furnish it to them. We are lighting 27 buildings, large and small, with the lamps, approximating a thousand lamps in use. This does not figure at a very high tariff per lamp for the past two years. I fully hope that this appropriation will not be kept in for the Indian school, and I wish you would see the Commissioner again, giving him these figures, and state to him that we have just spent nearly all of last year's gross income from the school in putting our line and apparatus in the highest condition for good service, and it would work a material hardship on us to have a plant installed.

Any information that you may wish I shall be pleased to furnish promptly.

Yours, very truly,

THOS. W. PEMBERTON, President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. One other word, Mr. Chairman. I would like to say that I wish to see any improvement possible at that Indian school, but I am convinced from that letter and knowing the man very well who wrote it that it is impossible for $7,000, or, as he says subsequently in that letter, for any $10,000 to install a plant that will be ready for service there all the time. It is intensely hot in the summer and they run quite a number of fans. They can not install any plant that will be ready for use during the whole twenty-four hours for twice what they have asked for in this bill. The expense for coal will be very high, on account of the long haul there. The light is now furnished by water power, and I am informed that it is furnished for half the price charged the city of Phoenix; so it strikes me, as a matter of economy and good service to the school, that the present arrangement should be maintained. Therefore I ask that the amendment be adopted striking out the $7,000 and leaving the $4,000 to pay for lighting the school, or whatever of that amount may be necessary. Last year it cost only $2,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the price paid for electricity at the Phoenix school is for the current only. The installation in the building, the wiring, the lamps, and everything of that kind have been put in at Government expense and are owned by the Government and cared for by the Government. What is paid to the Phoenix Electric Company is simply for the current, and that accounts, probably, for the fact that they furnish the current for a less price than they do to the ordinary consumer in the city, as well as the fact that this school is a large consumer.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My friend must be mistaken in the statement he makes, for the letter states that they have expended the entire gross receipts from the school in putting wires into the school there.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have not put the wires into the school. What they have done, probably, is to put in a new transmittal wire from the city to the school. I do not know about that, but I assume that is it. It is a fact that there has been much criticism that the current has not been what it should be. In a letter from the Commissioner, which refers to several matters, he has this to say about this subject:

Referring to the item for the Phoenix Indian School (lines 4 and 5, page 43 of the bill), electric light, $7,000, the memorandum which I furnished you concerning the necessity for this appropriation unintentionally omitted to give the reasons why this particular item is asked for. From the reports of the superintendent and Supervisor of Construction Charles, the electric-light system at this school is not satisfactory. All of the buildings are wired, and the school purchases the current from the electric-light company of the city of Phoenix. This current now costs 12 cents per kilowatt and 8 cents for power, and, at the time of the report of the superintendent, with soft coal at $6.30 a ton, the amount paid for light during the past fiscal year was $4,000 for the current alone. The superintendent says that the service is poor, and he recommends a complete lighting plant for the school. The school is 3 miles from the town, and the superintendent suggests that large establishments right in the city find it cheaper to run their own lighting plants than to buy the current. He therefore suggests an appropriation of $7,000 to purchase and install machinery, switchboards, etc., for lighting and electrical purposes.

Taking in consideration the large amount of $4,000 annually expended for current alone, and the school has to keep up repairs, would seem to make it desirable for the school to furnish its own current. There is a large heating apparatus connected with the school, an ice plant, pumping machinery, etc., which require the services of an engineer at all times, and with very little additional assistance as helpers to this engineer the expense on account of salaries would not be largely increased, and it is believed that by the installation of its own plant the school could save a great amount yearly, especially when it is noted that $4,000 a year is paid for current, and only $7,000 is asked to install the system.

Now that is an error. He means that is the amount appropriated. The figures given by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] are correct. There was $2,100 paid last year. During the summer quarter, when the school practically closed down, the amount was between two and three hundred dollars, and for the subsequent quarter it was not quite $1,000.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the chairman think that for anything like $7,000 they can keep a thousand lights burning and a great many fans in the summer time going with soft coal at $6.50 a ton, and more often $10 a ton, or furnish electricity for that great institution as cheaply as it is furnished according to the statement made in this letter? If it can be done I do not care. What I seek is that it shall be done for the cheapest possible amount. The school is supported in a great measure by the people, and the town is proud of it and aiming to make it the best school in the United States. I am anxious for them to have the best possible service and the cheapest possible rate. But with the mere installation of a $7,000 machine to light these great buildings, more than twenty in number——

Mr. SHERMAN. Twenty-odd; it is a very large plant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. An enormously large plant, with more than a thousand lights; I do not think that they can do it for the money.

Mr. CANNON. What is the annual cost?

Mr. SHERMAN. It was $1,800 in 1901, $2,400 in 1902. It is believed with this special plant that it would not exceed $3,000. This is simply for the current. It does not take into account anything but the electricity in this $4,000. There is nothing in this for the buildings nor repairs. The buildings are wired and lamped, etc.

Mr. CANNON. This is for the current?

Mr. SHERMAN. For the current furnished by the Phoenix Company.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say that to establish a plant of the kind the gentleman speaks of, $7,000, to furnish an electric light as it ought to be, the appropriation would have to be multiplied by at least 3, appropriation after appropriation. And if $3,000 or $4,000 will purchase the current, I have not any hesitation in saying that it is much better than it is to enter upon the erection and maintenance of an electric-light plant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And another thing I want to say in relation to that. I hope the chairman will recognize the fact that this plant is run by water power, which is an enormous water power at the falls. They transmit this electricity through great wires. They have just constructed a new line of wires, with very great wire, probably since this report was made, that would overcome any possible criticism as to the supply. That has all been erected now. And they are transmitting it over this new wire to the buildings of the school. Now, it is done cheaper than it could possibly be done by any $7,000 plant that might be established at the institution. And as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, it is a matter of economy; and that is the only interest I have in the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They can not do it for that sum of money. The gentleman from Illinois is correct in saying that they will have to have appropriation after appropriation, and half the time with a shortage of coal that there is you are going to find yourselves without electricity for the supply of that great institution. This institution has an unlimited supply that they can call for any minute of the day or night and it is there. With their own plant out of order half the time, with a $7,000 plant, they will not be able to make the supply; and I think to continue it under the present arrangement would give better service and at the same time will be economical. For those reasons I think that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois, because I assume from his remarks the gentleman is something of a practical electrician——

Mr. CANNON. Not a practical electrician.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean, perhaps, not a practical, but interested in electrical light concerns, so that you have personal knowledge of these matters, which I have not, and my judgment is based solely on the letters which come from the Indian office. Taking into consideration the fact that the buildings are all wired and lamped at the expense of the United States, repaired and maintained, is $7,000 insufficient for the installment of the machinery necessary to generate the current.

Mr. CANNON. Why, undoubtedly. In the first place, if you take a promoter that seeks to sell machinery for an electric-light establishment, he is a very plausible individual. He does not say much about the necessity of additional steam; he does not say much about the price of coal; he does not say much about the fact that the plant must not only have a dynamo, but it must have it duplicated, because there is all the while the danger of breaking and shutting down; he does not say much about the fact that you must have an extra boiler, he does not say there is more to pay for firemen and engineers; he does not say much about the fact that you must have an equivalent of a practical electrician. I have no hesitation in saying that, you take even a place like Washington, if you could get light for 3½ cents per thousand kilowatts it would be much better to buy the current than to erect an electrical plant in our great public buildings.

The trouble is we do not count wear and tear; they do not count the numerous things that are bound to be necessary in the way of duplication of motor, duplication of dynamo, and the wear and tear. Of course I know nothing about this. If there be water power within 3 miles of this Indian school, as the gentleman from Arizona has said, with the step-up and the step-down, as they call it, machinery, as I have no doubt they have, or would have to have, they undoubtedly could furnish it at a profit, and a very good profit, for much less than the Government could furnish it by the erection of a private plant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This letter which I have had read also says in a postscript, which the Clerk did not read:

P. S.—The 1,000 lamps installed means 100 horsepower. Of course, they do not light all at once, but there are times they need this amount or nearly so, and it will take more than $10,000 to install a plant of capacity to care for their wants. Of course, Uncle Sam is rich and can afford it. I understand at Lawrence, Kans., where coal is about $2.50 to $3 per ton, they pay nearly as much per kilowatt for electricity as we charge. One of the strong points in our favor is we give twenty-four hours' service, always ready.

Now, this gentleman says further that this must be a standing current. They keep a standing current any time in twenty-four hours, and there is no cessation, and to keep a current all the time by a $7,000 plant is absolutely impossible. Now, as the gentleman from Illinois says, there is a good deal in the way of repairs. They have to have duplicate machinery. It strikes me to be economy to let it go on at the rate they are charging of $2,000 a year.

Mr. SHERMAN. The price paid is 12 cents per 1,000 kilowatts for lights and 8 cents for power.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that is a very good price. It used to be 15 cents, and has been reduced to 10 cents in place where they have taken considerable amounts, and in many places where there is a very large amount taken the price is from 3½ to 4 cents per 1,000 kilowatts. But the practical maintenance is in and not out of an electric-light plant, with the duplicating of the machinery, and where the current can be purchased from private parties at anything like a reasonable price it will be cheaper than it will for the Government to erect a plant.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to accept the gentleman's amendment rather than to oppose it, but to offer an amendment to the section read. The amendment will read, "Provided, That not more than 10 cents shall be paid for 1,000 kilowatts for light, nor more than 6 cents for power."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, that would mean this: This man says that in Lawrence, Kans., where coal is two dollars and a half or three dollars a ton, they pay nearly as much per kilowatt for electricity as they charge. Well, your coal would be six and a half to eight dollars a ton.

Mr. CANNON. But I understood the gentleman to say that this is by water.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; it is by water.

Mr. CANNON. I will say that I have no doubt if the gentleman will put it at 8 or 10 cents they can very well afford to do the service, and I have no doubt it is less than the Government can do it by itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before I insist on my amendment let me ask the gentleman from Arizona a question. Does he think if we eliminate the provision for electric plant from the bill that the local company would enter into a new contract with the Indian Department to furnish light at 10 cents per 1,000 kilowatts?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I can not say; I have no information beyond what I have received in this letter. I know this—I wish I had the other letter here, in which it was stated that they were charging the city, and I guess they would not charge any more than they ever had—they were charging double to every other customer what they were charging this school.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York can secure it by putting it in the alternative; if they can not contract at 8 and 10 cents, make this appropriation available.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In which event they ought to make the appropriation enough to light the institution and not leave it at $7,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I will adopt this course, Mr. Chairman. I will not oppose the amendment, but I will suggest to the Indian Commissioner that he at once make inquiries of the Phoenix company, and if he does not succeed in making a fair contract we will ask the Senate to correct this and authorize the plant. There is plenty of time to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is fair; I want the service as cheap as it can be had.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 150 Indian pupils at Indian industrial school at Pierre, S. Dak., $25,050; for pay of superintendent of said school, $1,500; for general repairs and improvements, $2,000; lighting plant, $3,000; in all, $31,550.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, page 43, after the word "dollars," insert the words "carpenter and shoe shop, $600;" and in lines 13 and 14 strike out "$31,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$36,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 150 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Pipestone, Minn., $25,050; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,500; for general repairs and improvements, $1,000; for laundry building and improvements, $7,000; for enlargement of boys' dormitory, to supplement the appropriation made in the act for the current year, and to be immediately available, $4,000; for improvement in water plant, $2,500; for industrial-school building, to be constructed of stone, $15,000; in all, $56,050.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 3, strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "two hundred and twenty-five."

In lines 4 and 5 strike out "$25,050" and insert in lieu thereof "$37,575."

Strike out the words "remodeling dormitory, $7,000," line 8, and substitute "for additional buildings and improvements to complete plant, $16,000; for the purchase of additional land, not exceeding 162 acres, $11,745, to be immediately available: Provided, That in the purchase of said land not more than $72.50 per acre shall be paid;" and in line 9 following strike out the words "forty-two thousand and fifty dollars" and insert in lieu thereof "sixty-two thousand seven hundred and ninety-five dollars."

Mr. BURTON. This is the fourth instance among these South Dakota schools where the appropriation is very largely increased. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether he regards this large increase as necessary?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Commissioner writes as follows in reference to this proposed amendment:

Congress likewise gave $40,000 to increase the capacity of this school. Plans were formulated along these lines, and advertisement was had some time prior to the date of that for Chamberlain, when a school building and dormitory was secured for the Rapid City school at the lowest bid, $38,226. It was intended in these plans to remodel the present dormitory building, so as to give sufficient dining hall and kitchen accommodations in that building.

It was impossible to do this on account of the fact that the lowest bid received for it would have exceeded the appropriation by several thousand dollars. It is proposed out of the $16,000 to make the necessary changes in this dormitory, also provide a laundry, employees' quarters, and such other buildings as may be necessary to round out and complete the school for 300 pupils. Special inspector of farming industries, Levi Chubbuck, investigated the conditions recently at Rapid City School, and he said that the management of the school was efficient and progressive and he had no doubt but that when the new buildings were completed the school would be readily filled to the limit of its capacity.

At present, however, he states that there are lacking adequate facilities for industrial work, that especially in the direction of agriculture the opportunities are very much restricted on account of the limited area of tillable land available, and he was of the opinion that so long as this condition existed the Rapid City School would fall short of meeting the purpose of an Indian school of its class; that if it is expected that the children at the school shall at maturity be self-supporting, the fact should not be overlooked that self-support must come through some phase of agriculture; which being true, the school work, even in the class rooms, should be intimately associated with farm work, and especially should there be abundant opportunity to give instruction in garden, field, and stable.

He concludes, therefore, to meet this need at Rapid City, it must have more land for cultivation and refers to the 162 acres of excellent land adjoining the school grounds, which he thinks could be secured for $72.50 an acre, which price he thinks is not too much for it, considering location, quality of land, and being under irrigation. In view of the fact that unless this appropriation is made immediately available, the Government can not get possession of this land until after the 1st of July next, it is suggested that the same be made "immediately available," for the reason that the school will get all of the advantages of having the same in time for planting and pitching the crop, and it is urgently suggested that the words "immediately available" be added to the appropriation.

Mr. BURTON (before the reading was concluded). It is not necessary for the gentleman to read the rest of that document.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will print the balance.

Mr. BURTON. In general I do not believe in these appropriations, but I am informed that this is one of the most deserving schools in the whole list. It is some 200 miles from any other school. I withdraw opposition to this amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 150 Indian pupils, Rapid City, S. Dak., $25,050; for pay of superintendent, $1,500; for general repairs and improvements, $2,500; for water plant, $6,000; remodeling dormitory, $7,000; in all, $42,050.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out in line 6 the word "five" and insert "six." I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to the fact that this school has been increased, and provision made for maintenance there of 225 pupils; and that in all such schools the salary of the superintendent is not less than $1,600. At the Chamberlain school, which is identically similar to this, the salary of the superintendent is $1,600. Is there any objection to this amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I think not. I believe it is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOODY of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 13, page 28.

Mr. BURTON. I will ask the gentleman what is the object of his proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOODY] desire to return to the page indicated?

Mr. MOODY of Oregon. For the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. MOODY of Oregon. The paragraph to which I wish to return is the following:

For support and civilization of the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla tribes, Oregon, including pay of employees, $5,000.

To this paragraph the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] moved an amendment to reduce the appropriation. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs did not at the time have before him a list of the expenditures made during the last fiscal year, and consented to the proposed reduction of $2,000. Later he obtained the itemized list of expenditures, which shows that the expenditures last year were $3,217.33 and that $1,782.67 was returned to the Treasury.

I find, upon consulting the financial department of Indian affairs, that an appropriation of at least $4,000 will be required to properly administer the service contemplated in this paragraph of the bill, and I therefore move to amend by making the amount $4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back to the paragraph indicated and inserting the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOODY]?

There was no objection; and the amendment was accordingly adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collection and transportation of pupils to and from Indian schools, and also for the transportation of Indian pupils from all the Indian schools and placing of them, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such pupil moral, industrial, and educational training, under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor, $50,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 14 the word "fifty" and insert the word "forty." I trust that this discussion has thrown some additional light upon the extravagance and injudicious methods of our Indian school system. This paragraph, however, seeks to perpetuate and increase the most objectionable feature of it. This relates to the nonreservation schools. The amount appropriated last year was $40,000. It is proposed this year to increase the amount to $50,000. I have been very much interested to hear this morning the ground of advocating the nonreservation school instead of the reservation school. As I understand the opinion expressed by Colonel Pratt and some others, it is that the young Indian, man or woman, should be removed from the reservation to some remote place and never returned to his home.

With all due respect to those who advocate that idea, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that it is simply inhumane. It means that the young Indian child shall go away from his home, from his tribe, from his old father and mother, and that when he gets the benefit of improved civilization, when he basks in electric light and enjoys the bounty of the Government, he shall stray away to a place remote from those who gave him life and to whom he owes the chiefest duty. I know no reason for raising this $40,000 to $50,000 unless it be to stimulate that idea, to give some additional opportunity to remove a larger number not to the nearest school, but to the most remote. Now, no doubt many of these young Indians would succeed. Full bloods and half-bloods have become excellent citizens, industrious and useful, but I do not believe there is an overweening desire on the part of the Anglo-Saxon race to take them away from their tribes and their homes and by this extravagance foster a scheme under which they will be mingled with the white race.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman to this extent: I, too, am glad of the discussion of the past few days. It has shed light upon the Indian question—not to those whose duty it has been especially to originate legislation for those people in the past, but it has, I think, given to the members of Congress in general much information which they did not heretofore possess. I might say, in passing, that when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] directs his energies to any question and throws upon it the light of his intelligence, everybody is benefited by it. I do not, however, agree with his assertion that it has shown great extravagance.

I challenge that assertion. I think there has not been produced here evidence bearing out that assertion. He and I may differ materially as to the wisdom of certain appropriations. We do not differ as to some; we do as to others. But, frankly, I think the gentleman is in error in saying that vast sums are extravagantly expended. Now, in reference to this particular item, the increase is made necessary, first, by reason of the fact that the amount appropriated for the last two years has been found insufficient, and a deficiency appropriation has been asked for in each year. The deficiency last year was $6,000. The number of pupils has increased in the nonreservation schools and the number of schools has increased, so that it has made it necessary to ask for an increased appropriation for next year. It seems to me a very plain and simple proposition, and I trust the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all expenditure of money appropriated for school purposes in this act shall be at all times under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and in all respects in conformity with such conditions, rules, and regulations as to the conduct and methods of instruction and expenditure of money as may be from time to time prescribed by him, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior; and his action in these respects shall be conclusive and not subject to review by any other executive officer: Provided, That not more than $167 shall be expended for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school herein specifically provided for, except when, by reason of epidemic, accident, or other sufficient cause the attendance is so reduced that a larger expenditure is absolutely necessary for the efficient operation of the school affected, when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may allow a larger per capita expenditure, such expenditure to continue only so long as the said necessity therefor shall exist: Provided further, That the total amount appropriated for the support of such school shall not be exceeded: Provided further, That the number of pupils in any school entitled to the per capita allowance hereby provided for shall be determined by taking the average enrollment for the entire fiscal year and not any fractional part thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, strike out all of lines 23 and 24 after the word "Interior."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 15, page 18, insert: "Provided also, That in preparing implements and room for laundry work in all Indian schools, arrangements shall be made for doing by hand such an amount of said work as may be sufficient to teach the female pupils the art of hand laundry work."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERMAN] for some information which he can give more readily than any member of the House could investigate it for himself.

I would like to ask how the average per capita appropriation for the education of the Indian children at the present time compares with the average per capita appropriation which was formerly made for their instruction in the private schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. It always costs us less to educate the children in the contract schools than it did in the Government schools.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, it has always seemed to me that the uplifting of the Indians must be very largely done by the uplifting of the individual members of the tribe, and it seems to me that the discussion on this bill has tended to substantiate that conclusion. I think that it is a fair conclusion from a study of the history of the Indians in our country that the greater part of the civilizing influences that have permeated these originally barbarous tribes has come from the indefatigable efforts and self-sacrificing labors of the missionary clergy of the Roman Catholic Church, from the times of Marquette, Joliet, and Tonti down to the present day. And at the present time, when we are making these large appropriations for the education and civilization of the Indians, it seems to me that it would be a good policy for us, at least so far as the smaller and younger children are concerned, to return to the system of educating them in the private contract religious schools.

Certainly the first thing in the uplifting of primitive races is the driving out of superstition. Superstition is not a physical inheritance. It comes from environment, and the earliest glimpse of intelligence which primitive races get they get along the lines of superstition. It is my fixed conclusion that in the education of at least the younger members of the tribes greater progress would be made under the older system of instruction in the religious schools.

I should like to ask one other question, and that is whether the pro rata distribution of supplies and subsistence given under the treaties to these tribes is now withheld from those children who are in the religious schools and not in the Government schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is.

Mr. BOUTELL. Is that done under any act of Congress, or is it done under a departmental order?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is done under a departmental order, and the question has been raised that that order violated certain provisions of certain treaties. That question has been submitted to the Attorney-General, who has rendered an opinion that the order is not violative of the treaties.

Mr. BOUTELL. It seems to me that it is at least violative of the spirit and understanding of our engagement with those tribes. Could we not correct that by some provision in this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Personally, I wish we might.

Mr. BOUTELL. So that this pro rata subsistence which we agreed by treaty to give to these Indians should be given equally to those who are in the religious schools and to those who are in the Government schools.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I ought to say to my friend from Illinois that this question was brought up in the committee. An amendment was offered covering the point he now suggests, making it possible for the children in the non-Government school to draw the ration; but in the committee the point of order was invoked that it was new legislation and not in order upon an appropriation bill, and notice was given in the committee that a member thereof would raise the point of order upon the floor if the amendment was offered here; whereupon the gentleman who had offered the amendment in the committee stated that he would not offer it upon the floor if any member of the committee was to raise the point of order upon it.

Mr. BOUTELL. I would have been glad to submit such an amendment, but on the statement of the chairman of the committee it seems that it would be useless to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman can offer it, and possibly the point might not be raised against him. I do not know. I simply tell him what transpired in the committee. I might suggest to the gentleman that it was in the bill as reported a year ago and went out on a point of order. I do not remember who raised the point, but it was raised by some member on the floor.

Mr. BOUTELL. I withdraw the formal amendment and will submit the necessary amendment at the appropriate place at the end of section 5.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to section 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Court of Claims is hereby authorized to resume consideration of the claim of the Eastern Cherokees v. The United States, Congressional, No. 10386, and full jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine the legal and equitable rights of said Indians and of the Cherokee Nation under the treaties and laws relating thereto, and to render judgment thereon, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party to said suit feeling aggrieved at the judgment of the Court of Claims. The Cherokee Nation shall have the right to intervene in said suit, and if suit is brought by the Cherokee Nation under the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, or any other act, the Court of Claims shall consolidate said suits by proper orders: Provided, That the above reference shall not be construed as a concession that the Slade-Bender accounting was in fact an award or an account stated, or that the United States is indebted to said Indians in any sum or any account, or that it intends hereby to waive its proper and just legal or equitable defenses of any kind whatever; but said court is hereby empowered and directed to adjudicate said claim subject to the defenses aforesaid in accordance with the principles of law and equity.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order, or I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama for that purpose.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment involves a very important question. It is one upon which this House not long ago asked an opinion of the Attorney-General, and I will ask in this connection to print with my remarks the response of the Attorney-General to the resolution of the House. I would like to have this leave at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the paper described. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. I will not take the time of the committee to have it read at this time. This involves a very large claim that was referred to the Court of Claims by Congress. The Court of Claims in reporting it back did not determine the law of the case, but merely found the facts. The Attorney-General, Mr. Harmon, during Mr. Cleveland's Administration made a report which gave an opinion upon this claim, in which he declared it to be invalid. It is now claimed that the Court of Claims in their subsequent decision declared it to be valid. This was a controverted question. The Court of Claims, however, in their decision did not say that they held the claim to be a valid one, but simply found the facts; and under the Bowman Act I presume that was all they had the right to do. Therefore the question came back to Congress as to whether the claim should be allowed.

The subject was discussed in the Committee on Indian Affairs. The committee came into the House, asking the House to pass a resolution calling upon the Attorney-General to review the opinion of the Attorney-General, his predecessor, in connection with this later decision of the Court of Claims. The Attorney-General responds that he does not think that, in view of the litigation that is pending or likely to be begun growing out of the act of 1902, he ought to give an opinion upon the subject. Therefore this amendment is offered with a view of resubmitting the whole controversy, with the rights of intervention, to the Court of Claims, reserving, however, every defense, such as the statute of limitations, or any other sort of defense that the United States may have. With these limitations in this amendment I see no danger whatever in resubmitting the whole question to the Court of Claims and avoiding the examination of this large claim so far as Congress is concerned. I think, however, the point of order perhaps is well taken.

The opinion of the Attorney-General is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1903.

SIR: December 16, 1902, my opinion upon certain questions relating to the claim of the Cherokee Indians against the United States was requested by the following resolution adopted by the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby requested to advise the House of Representatives with all convenient speed in the case of the Eastern Cherokees against the United States whether or not the award rendered under the Cherokee agreement of December 19, 1891, ratified by act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, as set forth in House Executive Document No. 182, of the Fifty-third Congress, third session, and the findings of fact of the Court of Claims of April 28, 1902, is res adjudicata: to review the opinion of the Department of Justice of December 2, 1895, and advise the House of Representatives whether the reasons set forth in that opinion now constitute a valid defense to the payment of said award."

The agreement of December 19, 1891, referred to in the resolution and ratified by section 10 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1893 (27 Stat., 612, 640), as described in the agreement itself and in the ratifying act of Congress, is one between certain commissioners on the part of the United States and certain commissioners on the part of the Cherokee Nation. The fourth subdivision of article 2 of this agreement is as follows:

"The United States shall, without delay, render to the Cherokee Nation, through any agent appointed by authority of the national council, a complete account of moneys due the Cherokee Nation under any of the treaties ratified in the years 1817, 1819, 1825, 1828, 1833, 1835-36, 1846, 1866, and 1868, and any laws passed by the Congress of the United States for the purpose of carrying said treaties, or any of them, into effect; and upon such accounting, should the Cherokee Nation by its national council conclude and determine that such accounting is incorrect or unjust, then the Cherokee Nation shall have the right within twelve months to enter suit against the United States in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for any alleged or declared amount of money promised but withheld by the United States from the Cherokee Nation under any of said treaties or laws which may be claimed to be omitted from or improperly, or unjustly, or illegally adjusted in said accounting; and the Congress of the United States shall, at its next session after such case shall be finally decided and certified to Congress according to law, appropriate a sufficient sum of money to pay such judgment to the Cherokee Nation, should judgment be rendered in her favor; or, if it shall be found upon such accounting that any sum of money has been so withheld, the amount shall be duly appropriated by Congress, payable to the Cherokee Nation upon the order of its national council, such appropriation to be made by Congress if then in session, and if not, then at the session immediately following such accounting."

The last paragraph of section 10 of said act of Congress made an appropriation to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to employ persons to render "a complete account to the Cherokee Nation of moneys due said nation," as required by this provision. It is under this authorization that an accounting was had between the United States and the Cherokee Nation, as set forth in House of Representatives Executive Document No. 182, Fifty-third Congress, third session. Whether this accounting is in contemplation of law an "award," as described in the resolution, and therefore conclusive upon the United States, is a debatable question which it is not advisable for me to express an opinion upon at this time; but if it be an award, it is manifestly, under the terms of the agreement and the provision appropriating money to meet the expense of the accounting, an award in favor of the Cherokee Nation and not one in favor of the Eastern Cherokees.

Neither the agreement nor the provision appropriating money to meet the expense of the accounting authorized an accounting with the Eastern Cherokees, or between parties other than the United States and the Cherokee Nation, and if the accounting as had extended to matters outside of the authorization it is surely in that respect not obligatory upon the United States. Nor is there anything in the finding of the Court of Claims which charges or enlarges the effect of this accounting or makes it res adjudicata between the United States and the Eastern Cherokees.

The resolution also requests that I review the opinion of one of my predecessors, dated December 2, 1895, relating to this accounting, and advise the House of Representatives whether the reasons given in that opinion now constitute a valid defense to the payment of the money found due in such accounting. It does not seem advisable to comply with this request.

By section 68 of the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat., 716, 726), which act has been duly ratified by the Cherokee Nation, as required by sections 74 and 75 thereof, Congress authorized the Cherokee Nation to bring suit against the United States at any time within two years in the Court of Claims, with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court by any aggrieved party in interest, upon any claim arising under treaty stipulations which such nation may have against the United States, and authorized the Court of Claims "by proper orders and process to make parties to any such suit all persons whose presence in the litigation it may deem necessary or proper to the final determination of the matter in controversy."

The present claim is one arising under treaty stipulations, and is, therefore, one which the Cherokee Nation has a perfect right to litigate against the United States under this statute. The payment of the claim to another or adverse claimant would not be destructive of this right, nor would it constitute a sufficient defense to such a suit if upon judicial inquiry the court should find the Cherokee Nation to be the rightful claimant. The Cherokee Nation, as I am informed, asserts a right to this claim, has employed counsel to prosecute the same agreeably to said statute, and is about to institute a suit upon the claim in the Court of Claims against the United States.

The terms of the statute are, fortunately, such that the Eastern Cherokees, who, as I am informed, claim adversely to the Cherokee Nation, may be made parties to the suit and compelled to litigate with the Cherokee Nation their adverse assertions of ownership, so that the rightful claimant against the United States may be judicially ascertained after full opportunity upon the part of both claimants to be heard, and the United States be thereby fully protected in the payment of the claim to the successful claimant, if the claim be adjudged to be a valid one against the Government.

The duty of supervising and directing the defense of the Government in this suit in the Court of Claims, and in the Supreme Court if there be an appeal, will devolve upon me, and for that reason it is that I deem it inadvisable, as hereinbefore stated, to express an opinion at this time upon the question whether the accounting had under the agreement of December 19, 1891, constitutes an award, or concludes the Government, or upon the question whether the reasons given in the Attorney-General's opinion of December 2, 1895, now constitute a defense to the payment of the money found due upon said accounting.

The claim under consideration is a disputed one, to which there are adverse claimants, each asserting substantial support for its claim of ownership. Congress has provided a method of determining the validity of the claim and ascertaining the rightful claimant, which ought to be acceptable to all parties in interest, because it accords to each a full opportunity to be heard in the Court of Claims, with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court.

With respect to the findings of fact made by the Court of Claims in the advisory proceeding referred to in the resolution, it should be noted that no judgment was or could be rendered thereon, and that in concluding its finding the court said:

"But whether said sum of $1,111,284.70 was or was not improperly charged to the treaty fund, and whether interest should be allowed thereon, are questions of law upon which the court expresses no opinion."

Very respectfully,

P. C. KNOX, Attorney-General.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will permit me, I did not catch the reading of the proposed amendment in full. Does it reserve the right of appeal to the United States?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, yes; the right of appeal is reserved. The difficulty about the Eastern Cherokees is they are neither a tribe nor a band and have no legal capacity to sue. A suit was brought by the Cherokee Nation. The Eastern Cherokees are a part of the Cherokees, or one part of the tribe. The Cherokee Nation set up this claim in that action. This amendment would enable the controversy between the Eastern Cherokees and the Cherokee Nation to be disposed of at the same time by intervention when this suit is brought in the Court of Claims.

Mr. LITTLE. I would suggest, for the benefit of the House, the fact that under the treaty recently made, or the agreement, suits were authorized to be brought by the Cherokee Nation or any band thereof. It is suggested that while these Eastern Cherokees are a portion of the nation, the nation are not authorized to sue for them. This enables them to sue along with the nation or a band in bringing suits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order ought to be insisted on. It is clearly within the rule. Although this may be a very meritorious amendment, and I know nothing about its merits, I do not think a question involving several millions of dollars should come up in the House without notice and be considered at this time in this way. I therefore hope the gentleman from Illinois will insist on his point of order.

Mr. LACEY. I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that Congress has already legislated on the subject. There is an existing law to authorize the bringing of this very suit, but the Eastern Cherokees are neither a band nor a tribe, and the statute in question, therefore, is imperfect in this, that it excludes the large portion of the tribe from having their rights adjudicated in the suit, a suit that undoubtedly will be brought, whether the proposed amendment is enacted or not.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman that it seems to me that this provision is subject to the point of order, and I do not believe a matter of such importance ought to be dragged through on a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is clearly a matter of legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no purchase of supplies for which appropriations are herein made, exceeding in the aggregate $500 in value at any one time, shall be made without first giving at least three weeks' public notice by advertisement, except in case of exigency, when, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall make official record of the facts constituting the exigency, and shall report the same to Congress at its next session, he may direct that purchases may be made in open market in amount not exceeding $3,000 at any one purchase: Provided further, That funds appropriated to fulfill treaty obligations shall not be used.

SEC. 4. That when not required for the purpose for which appropriated, the funds herein provided for the pay of specified employees at any agency may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the pay of other employees at such agency, but no deficiency shall be thereby created.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the first four lines on the top of page 49, and shall ask to have it sustained unless some good reason is given why the artesian well and the ditches should be excepted from the general rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. This work is not done by contract. It is done under the direction of agents or special officials, and largely by the employment of Indian labor. That is the theory of dispensing with advertising for bids in that one branch of the service.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me that might create a situation in which fraud might be perpetrated.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the words "provided further," which seem to be unnecessary, inasmuch as the word "provided" appears at the foot of page 48.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President, may use any surplus that may remain in any of the said appropriations herein made for the purchase of subsistence for the several Indian tribes, to an amount not exceeding $25,000 in the aggregate, to supply any subsistence deficiency that may occur: Provided, That any diversions which shall be made under authority of this section shall be reported in detail, and the reason therefor, to Congress, at the session of Congress next succeeding such diversion: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior, under direction of the President, may use any sums appropriated in this act for subsistence, and not absolutely necessary for that purpose, for the purchase of stock cattle for the benefit of the tribe for which such appropriation is made, and shall report to Congress, at its next session thereafter, an account of his action under this provision: Provided further, That funds appropriated to fulfill treaty obligations shall not be used.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I think a point of order lies to nearly all of that section. It gives the right to transfer an appropriation from one object to another. Instead of specific appropriations for specific objects the Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President, may use any surplus that may remain in any of the said appropriations here made for the purchase of subsistence for the several Indian tribes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think no point of order lies against that, Mr. Chairman. I think no point of order can be properly laid against the provision which went out a moment ago upon the point the Chairman sustained. This is not legislation; it is the limitation upon the appropriation herein contained. It seems to me an appropriate limitation also. It is an appropriation that relates simply to the money appropriated in this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That when not required for the purpose for which appropriated, the funds herein provided for the pay of specified employees at any agency may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the pay of other employees at such agency, but no deficiency shall be thereby created; and, when necessary, specified employees may be detailed for other service when not required for the duty for which they were engaged; and that the several appropriations herein or heretofore made for millers, blacksmiths, engineers, carpenters, physicians, and other persons, and for various articles provided for by treaty stipulation for the several Indian tribes, may be diverted to other uses for the benefit of said tribes, respectively, within the discretion of the President, and with the consent of said tribes, expressed in the usual manner; and that he cause report to be made to Congress, at its next session thereafter, of his action under this provision.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know but that the decision of the Chair is conclusive upon this section; but it seems to me that this is subject to a point of order. We all know the reason why appropriations are not to be diverted from one object to another. If the appropriation is more than the amount required, the balance is covered back into the Treasury; if less, the executive department comes to Congress for an additional appropriation. Now, this makes the funds available for the pay of specific employees in case there is more than enough available for another class of employees. It authorizes a change or transfer of money from the object specified to others without further action of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is for an object provided for in this bill and this bill only. This identical provision has been on the Indian appropriation bill for at least ten years.

Mr. BURTON. One further point to which I wish to call attention. There is in lines 7, 8, and 9 this provision: "And when necessary specified employees may be detailed for other service when not required for the duty for which they were engaged." I can conceive circumstances under which that might be desirable, but I do not think it is in accordance with the policy pursued by Congress heretofore.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, a teamster on a reservation might not be needed in the line of his specific duty, and he could, under this provision, be otherwise employed. A blacksmith might have nothing to do and he might perform the service of a teamster who is in the hospital. So the employees occupying one position and another at an agency may be shifted if it is necessary for the good of the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that while the language may not be apt for the purpose, the result is equivalent to an appropriation of an indeterminate balance of money, already legally appropriated for the purpose provided by law, to other purposes provided by law, of the same character and of the same general authority of law now existing. It is not new legislation in any proper or ordinary sense. It is simply taking a balance of a fund, which might have been an original appropriation, out of the Treasury, and instead of taking it from the Treasury it is taken from that fund and appropriated for a purpose already provided by law. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That whenever, after advertising for bids for supplies in accordance with sections 3 and 4 of this act, those received for any article contains conditions detrimental to the interests of the Government, they may be rejected, and the articles specified in such bids purchased in open market, at prices not to exceed those of the lowest bidder, and not to exceed the market price of the same until such time as satisfactory bids can be obtained, for which immediate advertisement shall be made: Provided, That so much of the appropriations herein made as may be required to pay for goods and supplies, for expenses incident to their purchase, and for transportation of the same, for the year ending June 30, 1904, shall be immediately available, but no such goods or supplies shall be distributed or delivered to any of said Indians prior to July 1, 1903.

Mr. BOUTELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"Provided further, That in the distribution of subsistence or other supplies no discrimination shall be made against or on account of children attending private schools."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I make a point of order against that amendment. It is new legislation.

Mr. BOUTELL. I should like to be heard very briefly on this point of order, which I understand is made on the ground that the amendment is new legislation. It seems to me that this point is not well taken. We are, as I understand, under treaty obligations to make certain appropriations and distribute certain subsistence and supplies to the Indians. This subsistence and these supplies are distributed pro rata and per capita according to the membership of families, including the children. When these children are in attendance at the Government schools the full per capita distribution is made.

Now, I understand that on account of the establishment of Government schools, and not on account of any other law, the Interior Department has held that the pro rata distribution should be withheld from the children who attend private schools. Now, Mr. Chairman, the attendance of the children upon private schools entails no additional expense upon the Government. The pro rata distribution to these children would take place if they attended Government schools. There is no new legislation in this provision. It is merely declaratory; it merely interprets: it simply gives to the Department our understanding of the legislation in this bill. I submit, therefore, that no point of order lies on the ground that this is new legislation: because a distribution would be made to the children now in religious schools, not on account of any legislation, but simply by a change in their schools, if these children should leave the religious schools and attend the Government schools.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained to hold that this is new legislation. It undertakes to abolish a discrimination which, it is asserted or implied, is now made, either by law or without law. It undertakes to direct the exercise of a discretion heretofore authorized by law, or else it undertakes to regulate the action of this officer by some new provision or limitation of law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 5 of the act approved February 28, 1899, entitled "An act providing for the sale of the surplus lands on the Pottawatomie and Kickapoo Indian reservations in Kansas, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That before any of the surplus lands belonging to either of said tribes of Indians shall be sold under the provisions of this act there shall be allotted by the Secretary of the Interior 80 acres to each absentee of either of said tribes, and also to each of the children of members of the respective tribes born since the allotments heretofore made were closed and to whom allotments have never been made, but all allotments shall be made and accepted subject to existing leases: Provided, That in making these allotments the said Pottawatomie children and absentees shall be restricted to the Pottawatomie lands and the Kickapoo children and absentees to the Kickapoo lands: Provided further, That in case there are not sufficient surplus lands belonging to either tribe to allot lands to each child and absentee in quantity as above provided, said surplus lands shall be alloted to each of said children and absentees pro rata, as near as may be, according to legal subdivisions: Provided further, That this paragraph relating to allotments may be adopted or rejected by either tribe separate and apart from and without affecting the other provisions of this act."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], who has charge of this bill, to what degree, if at all, does this bill tend toward the abandonment of what is called the reservation policy which has heretofore characterized our Indian legislation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My question is, to what extent, if at all, does this bill undertake to abandon what is known as the reservation policy which has heretofore characterized the greater portion of our Indian legislation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Only so far as it relates to making surveys of certain reservations and making allotments on reservations. There are several general provisions in the bill which provide for surveys of some reservations specifically; also provisions for surveys in general and for allotments in general, the amounts to be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior on reservations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One other question—and I will say that the reason I ask these questions is that I was very much impressed by the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who, I think, rather took the position that our Indian policy has been somewhat of a failure; that at all events it is beginning now to be a failure, and because of preventing free intercourse of the whites and Indians by this reservation policy. Will the gentleman from New York tell me and the Committee of the Whole how many Indians can read and write English?

Mr. SHERMAN. I could inform the gentleman after looking over the statistics, but I have not the number in mind. There are nearly 30,000 Indian children in schools to-day, out of 260,000 Indian population.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many of the parents of these Indian children can read and write?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know. The gentleman, by examining the census reports, can ascertain. I have not the figures in mind.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want the gentleman to understand that in making my inquiry I pay him a compliment, because I think there are very few questions that have ever been asked of the gentleman that he has not been able to answer very thoroughly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the gentleman for his compliment. I am sorry I do not happen to remember what he wishes to ascertain. I will say frankly that I have looked over the statistics, but I do not carry in my mind the answer to the question which the gentleman propounds.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell the committee, then, how these children are progressing, as a whole, who are being educated to speak and read English? Are they simply going to school and going to school and going to school and learning a little education and then going back home, tying a tail on their backs, putting a skin over their heads, and taking to the mountains again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Tennessee that the debate is on striking out the last word to a single section of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that sufficient time be given the gentleman to ask what questions he desires, and that I may be allowed to answer them briefly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman can see that I have not this information, and I am called on to vote on this bill. I am very much impressed with what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has said, and I really would like to know what effect our efforts to educate these people have really had in educating them and in really civilizing them, as to whether that civilization lasts when they go back to their territory. I understand they take right to a horse and skin and sled and dog and go out into the mountains. I was so informed yesterday, and I should like to hear the gentleman along that line.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's question is a broad and sweeping one and is difficult to answer in a word. I will say to him, however, that in my judgment the education of the Indian during the last two decades has tended to the very material elevation of the Indian race, very material. It is true that in many cases an Indian attends school, reservation or nonreservation, learns to speak the English language, to wear clothes, to live as a civilized person lives, and that when he goes back to the reservation, surrounded by reservation conditions, it is not long before he has discarded his clothes and his habits of cleanliness and civilization, has put on the blanket, and has dropped to the level of his surroundings. I think in every case, however, that when a boy or girl or any great number of them go off to school and return to their homes, while unquestionably many times they are drawn down to the general level, yet it never happens that such association does not elevate the whole plane at least a trifle.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, if the gentleman will indulge me for a moment, I would like to ask——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. Wherever and to the extent that any of the lands within the place limits of the land grant to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company within the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico were placed within any Indian reservation after the time when the right of the railroad company attached by the definite location of its line of railroad opposite thereto, and are still embraced within such Indian reservation, the Secretary of the Interior shall be duly authorized, in his discretion, to exchange surveyed public lands in the same Territory which are vacant, unappropriated, not mineral, and not timbered for private lands in such reservation of like area and value in the alternate sections granted to the railroad company, so far as may be necessary to obtain full governmental ownership of all the lands within such Indian reservation.

The railroad company or its grantee must, at its expense and by appropriate instruments of conveyance, surrender to the Government the full and unencumbered right and title to the private lands included in any exchange before patents are issued for the public lands included therein, and no charge of any kind shall be made for issuing such patents. Upon the completion of any exchange, the lands surrendered to the Government thereunder shall become a part of the Indian reservation within the limits of which they are situate. Nothing herein shall in any manner be so construed as to authorize the issuance of any land scrip, or to enlarge the quantity of land to which such railroad company or any of its grantees may be entitled under existing law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order against that amendment, though I dislike to. I wish to know what the purpose of the amendment is, and until I hear I shall reserve the point of order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall make the point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio please state his point of order?

Mr. BURTON. That it is absolutely new legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. If the committee will bear with me for a moment, I would like to have the gentleman reserve his point of order, because this amendment is offered at the request of the Department, and I would like to have a letter from the Department read in support of it. A large number of reservations have been extended by Executive orders, and private lands have been taken within those extensions. Last year the committee had to appropriate some $28,000 to pay for the property owned by private individuals around which the limits of a reservation had been extended by an Executive order of the late President McKinley. This amendment simply gives them authority to exchange public lands in the same Territory and of the same kind as that included within the reservation as extended for the lands so taken. I would like to have the letter, which I send to the desk, read, as it explains the necessity of this amendment, and then I hope that the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 12, 1903.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Recently you informally called to the attention of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs the fact that in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico there are Indian reservations in which the alternate even-numbered sections are owned by the Government and the alternate odd-numbered sections are held in private ownership under the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad land grant. This situation is indeed an unfortunate one and is peculiar to certain reservations in Arizona and New Mexico. It arises from the fact that after the definite location of the line of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, and therefore after the right of the railroad company to the alternate odd-numbered sections had become vested and had passed beyond the control of the legislative or executive branch of the Government, certain Indian reservations were established within the limits of this railroad land grant, and certain other existing reservations were enlarged so as to include lands within the limits of said grant.

The result is that there is a divided ownership and a divided authority within the limits of these Indian reservations. This is destructive of the authority of the United States within the reservations and is alike injurious to the Indians and to the owners of the railroad lands. It works a serious injustice to those holding the railroad title, because while compelled to pay county and Territorial taxes upon their alternate odd-numbered sections they are unable to use them without coming into conflict with the Government's authority over and the Indians' use of the alternate even-numbered sections. It is especially desirable that this situation shall be changed. The Government, the Indians, and the owners of these private lands will be mutually benefited thereby. We respectfully recommend that the following provision for relieving this situation be inserted in the pending Indian appropriation bill or be made the subject of an independent bill, as may be deemed most advisable:

Wherever and to the extent that any of the lands within the place limits of the land grant to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company within the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico were placed within any Indian reservation after the time when the right of the railroad company attached by the definite location of its line of railroad opposite thereto, and are still embraced within such Indian reservation, the Secretary of the Interior shall be duly authorized, in his discretion, to exchange surveyed public lands in the same Territory which are vacant, unappropriated, not mineral, and not timbered, for private lands in such reservation of like area and value in the alternate sections granted to the railroad company, so far as may be necessary to obtain full Governmental ownership of all the lands within such Indian reservation.

The railroad company or its grantee must, at its expense and by appropriate instruments of conveyance, surrender to the Government the full and unincumbered right and title to the private lands included in any exchange before patents are issued for the public lands included therein, and no charge of any kind shall be made for issuing such patents. Upon the completion of any exchange, the lands surrendered to the Government thereunder shall become a part of the Indian reservation within the limits of which they are situate. Nothing herein shall in any manner be so construed as to authorize the issuance of any land scrip, or to enlarge the quantity of land to which such railroad company or any of its grantees may be entitled under existing law.

We believe this provision fully meets the existing situation and contains safeguards which amply protect the Government and the Indians and effectually preclude injury to individuals. Equality in advantages resulting from every exchange is assured. Exchange is not compulsory on the Government and can be made only where it is deemed advisable by the Secretary of the Interior. No exchange can be made which increases the acreage of any private owner or diminishes that of the Government, or which changes the character or value of the lands held in public or private ownership, or by which the Government surrenders any mineral or timber lands. No roaming right of lieu selection is given, and no land scrip can be issued. The lands to be given in exchange by the Government are confined to surveyed public lands in the same Territory, and the authorization extends only to obtaining full governmental ownership of all the lands within these Indian reservations.

We sincerely trust that the provision here proposed will receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

Very respectfully,

W. A. JONES,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.
E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not see my way clear to withdrawing the point of order. It seems to me that it is clearly new legislation, and it is too important a proposition to tack on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with sundry amendments, to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Pending this motion, if my friend will permit, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 36 for a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a motion pending, made by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and unless he withdraws that motion it is the duty of the Chair to put it to the committee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman kindly withdraw his motion for a moment? I desire to make a statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw it for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the committee yesterday, by a vote of 26 to 19, voted to strike out the lines from 3 to 6, inclusive, on page 36, which means that the Indian warehouse in St. Louis, only recently established, shall be abolished. I am quite certain that the committee voted under a misapprehension of the facts. It was stated in support of the motion to strike out that but a comparatively small quantity of goods had been shipped from that warehouse to the Indian reservations. The reason for this is that the warehouse has only been established for three months, and consequently it is not yet in working order.

Our argument in favor of the maintenance of an Indian warehouse in St. Louis, supported as it is by all the merchants and commercial interests of that great city, is that St. Louis is nearer to the Indian reservations than almost any other large city in the country. Furthermore, all the goods which are being bought for the Indians can be bought more cheaply in the market of St. Louis than almost anywhere else. I refer to the articles specifically needed for the Indians, such as blankets, meats, flour, tobacco, shoes, and so on. Therefore the maintenance of an Indian supply bureau in St. Louis is of the utmost importance, and certainly beneficial to the service. An appropriation of $10,000 only is required for the maintenance of that bureau, and I sincerely trust that the committee will reconsider its action and keep this item in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I ask that the committee reconsider its action on this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SHERMAN. To make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. To make a statement. The gentleman has not made any further motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with the several amendments, and with a favorable recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, is my motion to reconsider not in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri can ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman from New York will withdraw his motion, to go back to this item in the bill for that purpose. Otherwise the gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Pending this motion of the gentleman from New York, I obtained unanimous consent to go back to page 36.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not asked unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I thought I had.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my motion.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then I give notice that I will demand a separate vote on this amendment.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GROSVENOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15804) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole, on page 36, to strike out lines 3 to 6.

The SPEAKER. The vote will first be taken upon the other amendments, reserving the one stated by the gentleman from Missouri for another vote.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment excepted by the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 36 strike out all of lines 3 to 6, both inclusive, the language proposed to be stricken out being:

"To maintain at the city of St. Louis, Mo., in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, a warehouse for the receipt, storage, and shipping of goods for the Indian Service, $10,000."

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15069. An act granting an increase of pension to Daniel P. Marshall;

H. R. 15922. An act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to more effectually suppress and prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10698. An act providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the Lac Courte Oreille and Lac du Flambeau reservations in the State of Wisconsin; and

H. J. Res. 216. Joint resolution extending the provision granting to the State of Pennsylvania the use of the court-house at Scranton and Williamsport, Pa.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 1147. An act for the relief of the First Baptist Church of Cartersville, Ga.; and

H. R. 11858. An act for the relief of William E. Anderson.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 569) to establish the department of commerce and labor, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HANNA, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 342) for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MOODY of North Carolina, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16990, being the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 16990, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16990) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that there is to be some general debate on this bill, and to-morrow is Friday, to be taken up by the Committee on Claims, I shall reserve my time until we can approach nearer the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour to the gentleman from Tennessee, and then another member of the Committee will yield to him thirty minutes. I think the gentleman wants an hour and thirty minutes. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have an hour and thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Tennessee be accorded an hour and thirty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, except for the fact that when the antitrust legislation, proposed by the majority of the Judiciary Committee, comes before the House I shall not then have the time to submit my views upon it, I should not now bring the subject up for discussion.

The industrial activities of our time have assumed in rapid sequence forms hitherto unknown, and the influence of allied wealth for good or evil is a subject which may well engage the serious attention of all.

The causes of its growth, the reason for its combination, its regulation and control as it enters into the trade of the nation and of foreign countries, the power of Government in relation to it, are all of prime importance.

The first and natural form of business enterprise was that engaged in by one person, which was restricted to his means, while individual responsibility, financial and moral, was the leading factor. A reputation for personal integrity was an asset of at least equal value to financial responsibility in this initial form of trade, and the relations of seller and buyer were as man to man, with the rights of each dependent upon laws and customs governing both in the same degree.

The partnership form followed when the scope and sphere of business sought enlargement, making more capital necessary and calling for associated effort. But in this also the element of personal responsibility was still preserved and individual integrity remained in the industrial equation. Moreover, the holdings of the individual, whether singly or in partnership association, could not be held in perpetuity, the span of human life measuring the limit of acquisition and ownership.

In the next stage of evolution came the corporation, where more persons were associated, greater capital was employed, the sphere of trade more widened, and where individuality gave way to the corporate existence. The corporate life, being wholly artificial, may hold property in perpetuity, and, possessing the quality of legal immortality, there may be no limit to its acquisition and ownership.

The last process of combination is found in the instance of corporations chartered with a large capital, having no business of their own, the purpose of the organizations being to control and combine other corporate entities, and, with unified wealth and power, direct the business of all. The most conspicuous example of such combination is the United States Steel Corporation, which was chartered under the laws of New Jersey in February, 1901.

Corporations of a public character, such as common carriers and the like, were within the memory of living man almost the only kind in existence, and industrial combinations for trade and barter in the commodities of life were few in number, and thousands of men bought and sold who never came directly or indirectly under their influence. Now, however, they touch all people, and throughout the ordinary transactions of life they must deal and reckon with the corporate force, and its effects are felt socially and economically, in the home, in politics, and throughout the world of trade.

The tendency toward the unification of wealth is marked and rapid, and has introduced new elements of uncertainty and radically changed old conditions.

As corporate power is centralized and made more and more effective, the influence of the individual is less and less felt; as the one absorbs the other loses, and the American of to-day is fast becoming a dependent, with rights impaired, controlled by the creatures he has made for his welfare and service, who have grown so strong as to exact this service from their creators, and now defy them in the plenitude of their power.

MONOPOLY AND PERPETUITY.

Our English-speaking ancestors were opposed to monopolies and perpetuities in any form, and in our own and advanced conception of government the right of the citizen to the full enjoyment of all the privileges which republican liberty bestows are paramount.

So whatever may lessen full opportunity for the citizen, whatever tends to the creation of great centralized power either in the government or by means of combinations organized for the control of markets or prices, whatever, in short, tends to decrease fair competition, or whatever by law confers special privileges to a few and accords unusual power to a class is opposed to and subversive of republican government.

Present industrial conditions in this country have their analogy in feudal holdings and transfer of landed estates, which gave rise to the mortmain law of England.

The prevention of monopoly, to the growth of which perpetuity was necessary, was the one thing above all others which the English-speaking people sought to attain. The chief means employed were restrictions against mergers and consolidations.

The thirty-sixth section of Magna Charta was a mortmain law having that very end in view.

Land being the principal source of wealth and the productions thereof at that time the principal source of commerce, that law prohibited the formation of "landed trusts," which were being established more than seven hundreds years ago much as our modern stock and manufacturing trusts are now established.

To escape the burdens of feudal tenures, inferior landlords would surrender their titles to some corporation sole, as a bishop or abbot, who was exempt from feudal service, and take from the new owner a lease in perpetuity of the same lands, and in that way enormous landed estates were built up in these corporations sole, so that it seemed at one time that the land of all England might be thus absorbed.

To prevent the locking up of lands in the "dead hand," the mortmain statute provided:

It shall not be lawful for any to give his lands to any religious house and take the same back to hold of the same house. Nor shall it be lawful for any house of religion to take the land of any and to lease the same to him of whom he received it. And if any from henceforth give any lands to any religions, and thereupon be convicted, the gift shall be utterly void, etc.

Other statutes intended to more fully prevent land monopoly were passed, such as the statute "de religiosis" and the statute of 9 George II, chapter 36.

Going back in order of time, it may be stated that the mortmain law of Magna Charta was, in the reign of Henry VIII, applied and extended to all guilds, fraternities, commonalties, companies, or brotherhoods.

These provisions of the common law have descended to us, and we find in the bill of rights appended to the earlier constitutions of the States the declaration, "That monopolies and perpetuities are contrary to the genius of a free people and should not be allowed."

The Sherman law of 1890, to prohibit combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade, was only expressive and a restatement in applicable and concrete form of the common law of England, which had existed for centuries as a protection and defense to the people against the evils of monopoly.

So we find the elements and evils of the modern commercial trusts like the landed trusts of England in John Lackland's day, creating the same fears among a people ever devoted to liberty, jealous of individual rights, and distrusting all forms of monopoly.

The development of combinations to control the prices of articles of necessity and to monopolize fields of activity in modern commerce has been so rapid that, almost without their knowledge and without a full comprehension of the mighty forces at work from which the new order of things has come, the American people have had their dearest interests invaded and imperiled.

Expressions of the fears and protests of the people are found in the platforms of both political parties, in legislation by 31 States of the Union, are indicated from the press, the pulpit, and the platform, and in the various messages of Presidents directing the attention of the Congress to the magnitude of the evil and the necessity of remedy by appropriate legislation.

But since 1890 no national legislation has been had, and in a steady and persistent ratio combination has succeeded combination, until now many of the avenues of trade are closed, immense interests are controlled, and many of the necessaries of life monopolized.

Allied wealth is having its splendid day.

It threatens the small and timid competitor until its business is destroyed or it joins on terms prescribed for it the union of industries and loses itself in the whole.

It blights individual effort and enterprise.

It levies tribute upon every class and condition of citizenship.

It shadows and dwarfs the man.

And in its imperial sweep it holds the power to thwart and baffle the will of the people.

TARIFF RESPONSIBLE.

For the cause of this growth and perversion of corporate power we must look primarily to the tariff laws of the United States.

By a studied system of class legislation and favoritism men have been permitted to acquire illegitimate and abnormal wealth at the expense of the general public, and, once acquired, the affinity of wealth with itself was so strong that the anomalous conditions existing at the present are the inevitable result. The first and natural remedy, therefore, in the interest of the people would be a recasting and reduction of tariff duties, so that if competition be destroyed within it should come from without, and give to the masses the benefit of fairer and freer markets.

The President with studied emphasis has declared that the tariff laws do not affect the trusts and are not responsible for their existence.

He professes to be in favor of legislation for the control of industrial combinations.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, no man can be an honest trust reformer unless he is an honest tariff reformer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

To now advocate the retention of high and prohibitive duties on articles controlled by industrial combinations, which have monopolized the home market and grown enormously rich, which give the advantage in price to the foreigner at the expense of the home consumer, is to stand for a pernicious principle which is inherently wrong and which will inevitably lead to confusion.

The manufacturing interests of this country, controlling the output and price of articles of common necessity, should be stripped of every vestige of misnamed protection whereby the tribute of the people is exacted. When what is called the American system was first advocated by Henry Clay, it was to be but a temporary expedient to stimulate manufacturers, then few in number and weak in resource, and it was defended upon the ground that agriculture was strong enough to bear whatever of burden the policy might entail.

The agricultural interests at the inception of the policy were alarmed, particularly those of the Southern States, whose people depended upon the products of the soil, and the fears then expressed have found a full justification in subsequent events.

As a result of that policy we not only find abnormal accumulations in the hands of a few, but the ratio of increase between urban and rural population largely augmented in favor of the former, and young men, abandoning the quiet pursuits of agriculture, crowd the cities to become attendant and dependent upon the power of money and subject to artificial distinctions which that power imposes. This unhealthful condition is peculiarly unfortunate in a Republic where the strongest ties which bind a citizen to his country are found in ownership of the soil and where independence in manner of living as well as thought are so essential to the preservation of our best ideals.

From the census reports of 1900 we find that in the decade between 1880 and 1890 the manufactured products for the first time exceeded in value those of the farm, and that agriculture, which had been the foremost branch of industry as well as the strong arm of government, had from that time on occupied a subordinate position.

The comparative reports on agriculture and manufacture show that the total value of all agricultural products, including live stock, for the year 1899, which is the last computed, was $4,717,069,973, while the total value of all manufactured products for 1900 was $13,010,036,514.

The startling disclosures of these figures are better understood when it is stated that the total of capital employed in manufacturing enterprises was $9,831,486,500, which shows that the manufactured products, in excess of capital employed, are nearly equal in value to all agricultural products, while the total value is almost three times as much.

Can a policy of exclusion and pernicious favoritism by the Government be longer justified in the light of these statements?

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to treat the question I am discussing in a sectional spirit. It is a broad national question, in which all the people are concerned; but the argument may be illustrated by the effect the tariff laws have had upon the cotton-raising States of the South, and what is true of them will be true of all other agricultural interests in the country, so far as concerns the operations of a protective policy.

A comparative statement of the value of farm products, agricultural products, and population of nine typical cotton-raising States with a like number of typical manufacturing States of the North will illustrate the inequalities and unfairness of the tariff to the American farmer.

The tables below are compiled from the census reports of 1900:

Texas	3,048,710	Vermont	343,641
Total	16,592,939	Total	20,996,695

The total value of agricultural and manufactured products of the nine cotton-raising States of the South amounts to $1,729,501,911, while the value of manufactured products alone in the single State of New York reaches a sum far in excess of this amount. This, as well as other comparisons which may be drawn from the statistics, will illustrate the concentration of wealth and the unequal favors which a protective tariff bestows and the unequal burdens it imposes.

The cotton crop of the South is its great money crop. It has been in the past, and will be for many years to come.

This year, with prevailing prices, estimating the total crop at 10,000,000 bales, a sum approximating $500,000,000 will be realized for it and its by-products.

The price it brings is a strictly competitive one, and as we export more than we consume, it is therefore fixed in the foreign market.

Be the price large or small, it is always the lowest based on the law of supply and demand.

With this crop nearly the whole of civilized mankind is clothed, and the South, by reason of her climate and soil, has possessed a natural monopoly by situation in the supply of this article of almost universal necessity.

The value of the exported cotton alone exceeds the combined value of all the iron ore, gold, and silver produced in the United States, while the total value of the cotton crop of the South is greater than the combined value of all the iron ore, gold, silver, petroleum, and anthracite coal produced in the United States. When it is manufactured into articles of use, the value is so large as to be almost beyond accurate computation.

In its new form it comes back to the producer loaded down with tariff duties, and is sold to all the consumers of the country at high protection prices.

Not one bale of this immense crop can be successfully raised in the Northern States, while every great product of the North and West, such as hay, corn, oats, and wheat, may be and is successfully raised in the South.

With all this source of wealth, and endowed by nature with exclusive advantages of soil and climate, we find the Southern States in industrial servitude.

Throughout their limits there is not one line of trunk railroad to my knowledge that is owned or controlled by Southern capital. Local fire and life insurance companies are few in number and weak in comparison, and this business is practically done with Northern companies; likewise as to telegraph companies.

The manufacturing enterprises of the South represent in great part the overflow capital of the Eastern centers, and our banks are more or less controlled by the same influences. It is little wonder, then, that, contributing, as she must, her proportion of tariff exactions, and with the constant drain of a forced dependence which these exactions have caused, her substance should have gone in a steady and never-ending flow to the great money centers of the East.

And if perchance some of it returns seeking new and unexploited fields, it is welcomed and protected, but it does not compensate for the loss of industrial independence.

The results of war, devastating as they were, were but temporary and of small consequence compared to the wrongs the South has suffered since then by the most infamous tariff laws ever devised by the cunning and cupidity of man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Without one combination controlling prices in all her borders, she must pay the dual tribute which the tariff and the trusts exact.

I have often thought the South has been the most discriminated against of any section of the country. It is the most conservative portion of the American Union, with a white population more nearly homogeneous, and the day may yet come when it will be the nation's dependence if riot and revolution are to be quelled, the seeds of which the Republican party is sowing every day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the South is true to her material interests, she will remain in the Democratic party until she can have fair trade and buy, as she must sell, in competitive markets.

If she is true to her racial and social instincts, she will remain so long as Theodore Roosevelt shall be President of the United States. [Applause on Democratic side.]

What can be expected of a man whose training, whose strenuous life, whose lack of sympathy with the masses, promise no measure of relief to a tariff-ridden people?

Author Roosevelt, in his "Life of Benton," speaks of Thomas Jefferson—one of the greatest men who ever lived or died—as a "shifty doctrinaire," * * * "the father of nullification and therefore of secession;" of his theories as "cheap pseudo classicism borrowed from the French revolutionists," and in estimating the character of Jefferson said he was "constitutionally unable to put a proper value on truthfulness."

No wonder that the President denies the principles of white equality before the law, which Jefferson stood for, and recognizes the social equality of races which Jefferson would have denied and of which he could have no conception.

It is no marvel, therefore, that he should believe an unjust tariff has not made illegitimate combinations of wealth possible, or that he should divide them into "good and bad trusts."

Thieves can not be divided into good and bad thieves. They may differ in the amount of their larcenies, but thieves are all bad. So the American people think of this arbitrary distinction of the President, and will still believe that all trusts are bad.

Jefferson was a foe to perpetuity and monopoly in all their forms, and his name and the immortal truths which he enunciated stand as a pillar of fire to guide the human race to liberty, and will live and burn throughout the world in undiminished glory when the name of Theodore Roosevelt and all he ever did or said will be forgotten by the sons of men. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, when our strenuous President went to the canebrakes of Mississippi on a hunt we all expected from the success which had hitherto attended his efforts in slaughtering wild animals that he would certainly get a bear. But the President failed.

However, when he goes trust hunting no one suspects him of serious intentions and there is no surprise manifested at his failure.

It is said that an old darkey who was his pilot caught a cub and tied it to a tree, but the President out of the goodness of his heart refused to shoot it, and I am quite sure if a trust were caught and tied to a tree he would think it was of the good variety and refuse to harm it. [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

REPUBLICAN INSINCERITY AND INCONSISTENCY.

The position and history of the Republican party on the question of trusts has been one of insincerity and false pretense.

With a majority and in full control of both branches of Congress, it has refused any relief; and industrial combinations on gigantic scales are forming as never before to control commodities of daily use and consumption without let or hindrance.

The former chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. Ray], now upon the Federal bench, in a labored report in the Fifty-sixth Congress undertook to show that the powers of Congress were exhausted in the Sherman law, and that a constitutional amendment was necessary before the question could be dealt with, and proposed an amendment to be submitted to the States.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] at another time in the same Congress submitted a report from the committee, in which he said, referring to combinations and conspiracies: "Congress can not with its present power restrain, control, or repress them. To-day combinations exist and control production and prices in many industries. Labor is affected, competition prevented, and industrial enterprise seriously injured."

So the Fifty-sixth Congress passed into history and the evils described did not diminish, but multiplied.

The first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress has expired without legislation, and in my judgment the short session will end with no measure of substantial relief enacted into law.

Before I came here I was led to believe that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], who has, as I understand it, prepared in whole or in part the bill now pending, was in the habit of eating a trust blood-raw before breakfast as an appetizer, but since then I am inclined to believe that it was all the hallucination of some newspaper man's mind.

The proposed bill, even if enacted into law, will not meet the expectations or just demands of the people.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question or two?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not a fact that in March, 1889, after a Democratic committee of this House, the Committee on Manufactures, had been investigating this trust question for two entire sessions of Congress, it did not report to the House that it was unable to agree upon any measure to remedy the trust evil?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I do not know how that is, but in 1889 the trust question in this country was not as acute as it is now, and people had not studied the question as they have since that time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Did not your House adopt a resolution reciting——

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. One moment. Under Republican policies and under Republican Administrations these great industrial trusts, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, from 1900 to the present time have arisen and been formed in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I like the gentleman's method of commencing only with 1900. I want to know if Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, did not, in December, 1887, call the attention of a Democratic House to the great growth of the trust evil, and if that Democratic House did not appoint the Committee on Manufactures to investigate the entire business; and if it did not, after wasting two entire sessions of Congress, report within two days of the end of the life of that Congress that it was unable to devise any measures to meet this evil, and if it did not recommend that the matter be referred to succeeding Congresses, when the next succeeding Congress had already been elected and was a Republican Congress? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman is through with his speech.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. One moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. In answer to the question put in the form of a speech by the gentleman, I am not probably as familiar with what occurred before 1900 on this question as I am with what has occurred since that time, but I want to say this: That if the country ever gets relief from the trusts it will be through the Democratic party, and it will never be through a party whose being and existence depend upon them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whenever I hear a Republican talk about wanting to hurt the trusts, it reminds me of the old negro who went out to look for work and prayed the Lord that he would not find it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, if the gentleman has answered the question, I want to ask him another one.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I answered your question. At that time the trust question was not acute as now. The tariff was the paramount issue. I add this in answer to your question. At that time no such thing was known in this country as one corporation organizing in a State to own and control rival corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman this question, if he has concluded his answer. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not a fact that at the next session of Congress, after the Democratic Committee on Manufactures reported that it was unable to agree upon the question, a Republican Congress passed the Sherman law; and if in 1892 the Democratic national platform did not specifically pledge the Democratic party to enforce that law and pass all needful amendments to it? And I will ask the gentleman, further, if upon that platform the Democratic party was not intrusted with office and power, both in the Executive and both branches of Congress, and if it did not go out of power without having written one line or syllable of amendment to that law? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I have answered that question once or twice before.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Democrats have no other history as to trusts.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee (continuing). I am not as familiar with ancient history as the distinguished gentleman from Iowa is, but I know something about contemporaneous events. Your President now and your committee has said that there is constitutional power to control the trusts, and that it is one that is vital before the American people; and I make the prophecy now that this Republican Congress will adjourn without a law being put on the statute books against trusts.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not believe that to be true; but what has that to do with the history of the Democratic party, that has twice been in power, with the next Congress controlled by the Democrats, and for four years, without one solitary word of legislation on that subject? What reason is there to believe that a restoration of the Democratic party to power will avail anything on this question?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. The Republican party in all its platforms and the Republican Presidents in their messages to Congress have urged action against the trusts. At the time the Democratic party was in power this question was not so acute. The tariff was the question which the American people believe lies at the basis of all allied wealth. If the Democratic party did not do anything then, does that form any excuse for the Republican party that it should do nothing now? The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that Grover Cleveland was aiming to correct the tariff laws of the country and to keep down favoritism and class legislation; and if Cleveland's ideas of tariff reform had been made the policy of this country allied wealth in its present shape would not have existed.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I wish to remind the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Iowa of a thing that the gentleman from Iowa may well consider, and that is that the Republican platform in 1888 denounced trusts; in 1892 the Republican platform more bitterly denounced trusts; but in 1896, when a different class of men controlled the Republican national convention, it failed to put one solitary word in the platform against trusts, and from that day until now nothing has been done by the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I suppose the gentleman from Iowa will agree to one thing, and that is that this legislation is needed, and to another thing, that the power to legislate is with the Republican party. The President has spent two or three pages in his message on this question, the Attorney-General has given an opinion to the Senate, and the country will know how the record stands when this Congres shall have adjourned.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Tennessee misunderstands me. I was only seeking to inquire——

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. If you rise to a question I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman misunderstood me. I meant to inquire what ground the Democratic party had for claiming it should be placed in power in order to deal with this question when everything done on the subject had been done by the Republicans, and the Democrats, though twice in power, in violation of their party pledge, had enacted no legislation on this subject.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Who doubts that the policies of the Republican party have created the trusts? Who doubts that a class of favoritism that enjoys discrimination as a result of those policies have made them possible? The American people will not be longer deceived on this question. In the gentleman's own State of Iowa there are signs of revolt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was going to say when I was interrupted that in regard to this bill reported from the committee, that there is one feature which I approve, namely, the provision against railroad discrimination. I think, however, very little has been added to the existing law on this subject, and which, had it been enforced in the past, would have proven adequate.

The first question treated is that of publicity. It provides for publicity but it does not compel publicity. That is a radical defect so far as this feature is concerned. The bill provides that the returns specified shall be made, and for failure this penalty:

> Any corporation failing to made such return, or whose treasurer or other officers shall fail to make the answers aforesaid, may be restrained at the suit of the United States from engaging in interstate commerce business until such a return is made.

If the return is made then the corporation can engage in interstate commerce, no matter what the returns may disclose, whether it be overcapitalized or operating to the hurt of commerce.

In the bill I have drawn it is provided, first, that a commission shall be created, and that the members of that commission shall be the secretary of commerce, the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Commissioner of Labor, which shall constitute and be known as the "board of corporations," and it provides for a full and complete return, using the language of the pending bill to show what the returns shall be. In the event of failure it provides not that corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations may be restrained by a suit to enjoin them from engaging in interstate commerce, but declares that the interstate business of such corporation or companies shall be declared unlawful. So that under this bill a corporation hereafter organized shall make these returns, and if it fails to do so may be enjoined. Under the bill I have prepared corporations hereafter organized as a condition precedent to further engaging interstate commerce must make these returns or else their interstate business is declared unlawful.

Now, if publicity, according to the Republican idea, is the first step toward regulation of the trusts, why not make the publicity feature mandatory? Why not make it a condition precedent to engaging in interstate commerce by corporations hereafter to be organized and obligatory upon those already organized? There is a vast difference between the authority which may or may not be exercised to restrain business and a total inhibition of commerce where the conditions governing the returns are not complied with.

The first might not compel obedience, the latter would. As it applies to corporations hereafter to be organized, it would not disturb the supply of the people, and every corporation intending to engage in interstate commerce would know before its organization exactly what to expect—that all its debts and contracts would be nonenforceable and its whole business unlawful unless the return was made as provided. In my opinion, all corporations now organized doing an interstate business should make the same returns under the same penalty for failure, for those now organized and doing interstate business are the ones who have the present capacity for evil, and the reasons are more apparent and controlling as applied to them.

In the message of the President we find that he speaks of overcapitalization as an evil and I find in the report of Attorney-General Knox, in response to an inquiry by Senator Hoar, that he treats overcapitalization as a fruitful source of fraud upon the public and a temptation to increase dividends by unfairly raising prices. But when we examine this bill from the committee we find no provision whatever on this subject, and corporations are left to capitalize as may suit their convenience, and their interstate trade, based on any sort of overcapitalization, is not disturbed.

In the bill I have drawn, if the board of corporations shall determine from the returns made that any corporation hereafter organized is overcapitalized, it shall not engage in interstate business and as a condition precedent to so engaging shall be capitalized at a fair valuation. And further, that for corporations now organized if it shall appear from the returns that they are overcapitalized and therefore doing a fraudulent interstate business, then such business shall be declared unlawful until they recapitalize upon a fair basis or until they pay into the United States Treasury a sum of money equal to the difference between their overcapitalization and a capitalization upon a fair and just valuation.

If overcapitalization is wrong, if these great corporations in their attempts to earn money upon stock that is watered and which represents no real value, raise prices and resort to other questionable methods, then I say again that the Republican party is insincere with the country when it fails to provide a remedy for overcapitalization. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It will not suffice as an excuse for nonaction that vested rights will be injured. There can be no vested rights in fraud, and this right of the people to protect themselves is of first consideration. To prevent overcapitalization in the future, to penalize it as it now exists, will, in my judgment, not only protect the innocent who may invest or who have invested in worthless securities so far as they can be protected, but will prevent untold evils if these inflated industrial enterprises should collapse and fall—the victims of their own greed.

Likewise I think if it should be made to appear from the returns of corporations engaged in interstate business, or from other sources of information, that articles of general use and consumption are monopolized, and the prices thereof are controlled and fixed to destroy competition, that the business of the corporations so engaged shall be declared unlawful.

This might for a time, and doubtless would, create some disturbance in supply, but if we are to reach the evil thoroughly we must not halt in the work for commercial liberty and the preservation of individual rights, which the full flood of corporate wealth may submerge.

"Diseases desperate grown by desperate appliances are oftest cured or not at all."

However, there is nothing desperate about the suggestion here made. No honest and legitimate business will be injured. No competitive industry can complain, and monopolies have not the right to protest.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa interrupted me and referred to the Democratic position before 1890, and I want now to call the attention of the House to one gigantic enterprise which is the last form of industrial combination, organized February 23, 1901, under the laws of the State of New Jersey. I select the United Steel Corporation as the archetype of the new form of the modern trust, both as showing its power and the necessity for remedial and preventive legislation.

It has an authorized capital of $1,404,000,000. The purpose of its organization was to acquire, control, or absorb other industries, which it did, and it stands to-day the most unique and powerful industrial combination in all the world.

In the December Century there appears an interesting and able article by Mr. Henry Loomis Nelson, a writer of high repute and professor of political science in Williams College, on the organization and history of the United States Steel Corporation. To show the number and magnitude of the corporations it absorbed, the properties it controls, and the prodigious force it exerts, both in the production and price of commodities, the following extract from the article is quoted:

The properties and revenues of the corporation are those of an empire. Its officers and wage-earners constitute an army in number, but an army of beneficent producers, not one of waste and destruction. Its landed estates are measured in square miles, and its railroads and boat lines make it a transportation company of no mean importance.

Its most important subsidiary company is the "Carnegie Company of New Jersey." The capital of this company is $320,000,000, half in stock and half in bonds. As the successor of the Carnegie Steel Company it is itself a combination of other companies, among them the most important of their kind in the world. It owns 19 blast furnaces and 6 rolling mills, among them the Edgar Thomson and Homestead steel works.

Another subsidiary corporation of the Carnegie Company is the H. C. Frick Coke Company, owning 40,000 acres of coal land, 20,000 acres of surface land, and 11,952 coke ovens. All of these lands and the ovens are situated in Westmoreland and Fayette counties, Pa. It owns also nearly 3,000 cars and now markets the product of 5,463 ovens belonging to other constituent companies of the United States Steel Corporation, besides the product of 1,600 independent ovens. Its capital stock is $10,000,000. The inclusion of this company brought into the combination one of the ablest men of the iron and steel business. It is due to Mr. Frick's development of the Connellsville region that the United States Steel Corporation possesses one of its most valuable properties—a property which is almost, if not quite, indispensable to the realization of its plans. Mr. Frick is now one of the largest owners of the new combination.

Another subsidiary company of the Carnegie Company is the Carnegie Natural Gas Company, which leases 98,000 acres of gas lands in Pennsylvania and West Virginia. It has 139 gas wells, 300 miles of pipe lines, and annually furnishes 11,000,000,000 cubic feet of natural gas.

The Union Railway Company, another Carnegie property, with capital stock of $2,000,000, operates about 74 miles of railroad track connecting the Monongahela River plants of the Carnegie Company and Bessemer with North Bessemer.

The Bessemer and Lake Erie Railroad Company is the lessee of the Pittsburg, Bessemer and Lake Erie Railroad, which, having $12,000,000 of capital stock, operates 263 miles of road running from North Bessemer, Pa., to Erie, in the same State, and Conneaut Harbor, Ohio. At this port on Lake Erie, the Pittsburg and Conneaut Dock Company owns the docks at the terminus of the railroad. These docks can accommodate daily 25,000 tons of iron ore and 4,000 tons of coal. This subsidiary company also owns nearly a half interest in the Pennsylvania and Lake Erie Dock Company and 25 per cent of the stock of the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Dock Company.

The Carnegie Company also owns five-sixths of the Oliver Iron Mining Company, and the United States Steel Corporation owns the remaining sixth. This mining company owns in fee or holds by lease iron-ore properties in the Vermilion, Mesabi, Gogebic, Marquette, and Menominee ranges in the Lake Superior iron region. It produces about one-quarter of the ore mined in that rich district.

Still another property of the Carnegie Company is the Pittsburg Steamship Company. This company owned, before the consolidation, 12 steamships and 2 barges, having an annual ore-carrying capacity of 1,276,800 gross tons of ore. It now operates all the vessels formerly belonging to itself and to the other constituent companies of the United States Steel Corporation. These constitute a fleet of 112 vessels, of which 69 are steamships and "whalebacks" and 43 are barges. Their total carrying capacity is 9,488,600 tons. These vessels of the Great Lakes include ships of ocean-going size. Among them are the four largest steamships of the lakes, which were purchased from the American Steamship Company by the American Steel and Wire Company for $5,600,000, each vessel having a carrying capacity of 9,000 tons. Each of the "whalebacks" can carry 6,000 tons of ore.

Other Carnegie properties are the Youghiogheny Northern Railway Company, and the Youghiogheny, Trotter, and Mount Pleasant water companies, with a total daily pumping capacity of 11,000,000 gallons of water. Finally, we have the Pittsburg Limestone Company, able to produce every day 4,500 tons of stone.

The second subsidiary company of the United States Steel Corporation is the Federal Steel Company, also of New Jersey. The issued capital of this company is as follows:

Preferred stock, 6 per cent noncumulative	$58,260,900
Common stock	46,484,300
Bonds (of constituent companies)	26,829,000
Total outstanding capital	126,574,200

The Federal Steel Company owns the Illinois Steel Company, with a capital stock of $18,650,000, and the Lorain Steel Company, having capital stock of $9,000,000. These two companies together own 21 blast furnaces and 6 rolling mills. In addition the Illinois company possesses a bridge and structural plant, two cement plants, a wire-rod mill, a bolt, nut, and rivet works, and a spike works. It further owns all the stock of the Chicago, Lake Shore and Eastern Railroad Company, which operates 299 miles of track; it owns several thousand acres of iron-ore lands, operates a number of mines in Michigan and Wisconsin, and owns 5,986 acres of coking-coal lands, part of which are in the Connellsville coal region of Pennsylvania and part in West Virginia. It also operates limestone quarries in Indiana.

The Federal Steel Company also includes the Minnesota Iron Company, which owns 150,000 acres of iron-ore lands in Minnesota and Michigan. The Minnesota Company, in turn, owns all the stock and $3,500,000 of the second-mortgage bonds of the Duluth and Iron Range Railroad Company, which operates 192 miles of track and has ore docks on Lake Superior.

Another property of the Federal Steel Company is the Elgin, Joliet, and Eastern Railroad Company, which operates 190 miles of main line and branches and 114 miles of spurs and yards, a total of 304 miles of track. Another road belonging to the Federal Steel Company is the Masontown and New Salem road, which brings its coal lands and its ovens in Fayette County in connection with the Baltimore and Ohio and Pennsylvania railroads.

The third subsidiary company of the United States Steel Corporation is the National Steel Company, with capital stock issued to the amount of $27,000,000 7 per cent cumulative preferred stock and $32,000,000 common stock, and an assumed bonded indebtedness of $3,819,000. This company owns 18 blast furnaces, most of which are situated in Ohio, the rest in Pennsylvania. The company also owns 6 rolling mills and steel works, ore mines in the Mesabi range, and coking-coal lands in Pennsylvania.

The National Tube Company, with capital stock of $80,000,000 equally divided between 7 per cent cumulative preferred stock and common stock, is the fourth of the subsidiary companies. It owns 5 blast furnaces, 9 rolling mills and steel works, 2 cut-nail factories, a galvanized and calamined pipe works, 14 wrought iron and steel pipe and tube works, 2 seamless pipe and tube works, coke ovens, coal lands in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio, limestone quarries, and Lake Superior ore mines.

The American Steel and Wire Company is the fifth of the subsidiary companies. Its capital stock is $90,000,000, $50,000,000 common and $40,000,000 7 per cent cumulative preferred; its bonded debt is $78,000. Its property consists of 11 blast furnaces, 15 rolling mills and steel works, 13 wire-rod plants, 23 wire-drawing plants, 16 wire-nail plants, iron-ore mines in the Mesabi range in Minnesota, in the Gogebic range, Wisconsin, in the Marquette range, Michigan, and in the Menominee range. It owns about 12,000 acres of coal lands in Pennsylvania, and limestone quarries.

The sixth subsidiary company is the American Tin Plate Company, with capital stock of $30,000,000 7 per cent cumulative preferred and of $30,000,000 common. Its property consists of 29 rolling mills and 26 tin-plate works.

The seventh subsidiary company is the American Steel Hoop Company, with capital stock of $33,000,000, $14,000,000 7 per cent preferred and $19,000,000 common; owns 3 blast furnaces, 14 rolling mills and steel works, more than 7,500 acres of coal lands, ore mills in the Mesabi range, and coke ovens.

The American Sheet Steel Company is the eighth subsidiary company. Its capital stock issued is $49,000,000, equally divided between preferred and common. Its authorized stock is $26,000,000 of each class, a total of $52,000,000. It owns 21 rolling mills and steel works, and more than 2,000 acres of coal lands in Pennsylvania and Ohio.

The ninth subsidiary company is the American Bridge Company, the authorized stock of which is $70,000,000, half in 7 per cent cumulative preferred and half in common. There has been issued $31,372,000 of the former and $30,950,000 of the latter. This company owns 1 rolling mill, 25 bridge-building plants, and 5 bolt, nut, and rivet works.

The Shelby Steel Tube Company, the tenth subsidiary company, with issued stock of $5,000,000, 7 per cent cumulative preferred stock and $3,151,500 common stock, has 5 rolling mills and 7 seamless drawn-tube works.

Finally, the United States Steel Corporation owns the Lake Superior Consolidated Iron Mines, with a capital of $30,000,000. These mines constituted the great Rockefeller properties, the acquisition of which was urged as essential by Mr. Carnegie while the combination was in process of formation.

The immensity of this property and the quantity of its output may be more impressive if the information is consolidated. Here, then, is a corporation which owns much the larger part of all the iron ore known to be in the ground in the Lake Superior region, and which, in 1901, actually shipped 61.6 per cent of all the ore shipments from the regions. The quantity of its ore is estimated to be 750,000,000 tons. Mr. Schwab, the president of the corporation, testified in the pending suit of Hodge, Smith, and Curtiss against the United States Steel Corporation that these ore properties are indispensable to the corporation.

The Lake Superior iron ore constitutes nearly three-fourths of the iron ore of the country. Moreover, it is the richest deposit of this mineral in the world. Nothing equal to it has yet been discovered. According to the testimony of Mr. John Birkinbine, an expert in iron metallurgy, and formerly president of the American Institute of Mining Engineers, there does not exist any "exploited ore deposit * * * which can be compared to what is known as the Lake Superior region." This superiority consists not only in the excellent quality of the ore, but in the "persistency of deposits." "In this region," said Mr. Birkinbine, "there was produced in the year 1901 more iron ore than was ever supplied by any entire country in a year, Great Britain and Germany being the only two countries which in any one year have approached an output equal to 85 per cent of that of the Lake Superior mines in 1901.

The total production of iron ore in the United States in 1901 was 28,887,479 tons. Of the total shipments, 20,589,237 tons were actually shipped from the Lake Superior mines. Of the whole Lake Superior product about 12,692,213 tons came from the mines belonging to the United States Steel Corporation, and this was nearly 44 per cent of the total ore product of the country.

Possessing the iron ore, the corporation also possesses the means for its transportation from the mines to the furnaces. It owns the fleet of 112 vessels already mentioned, the necessary terminals and wharves, and 1,467 miles of railroad having an equipment of 23,185 freight and other cars, and 428 locomotives.

Having brought the ore to the furnaces, of which there are 77, according to Mr. Swank, and 75, according to Mr. Schwab, the corporation possesses the means for transforming the ore into pig iron. It owns 54,269 acres of Connellsville coking-coal lands, there being less than 15,000 acres of unmined coal lands in the Connellsville region outside of the holdings of this corporation. It also holds or leases some 33,320 acres of steam coal, making, according to Mr. Schwab, a total of 87,589 acres, "situated in the best coal regions of the United States, and within easy access by economical transportation facilities to the producing mills." Of this coal 42,000 acres are of the celebrated Connellsville coal, which is recognized as the standard coking coal of the world, of which the average yield is 7,500 tons of coke to the acre, a total of 315,000,000 tons for the 42,000 acres.

Bringing the ore and the fuel, with abundant limestone, to its furnaces, it is able to produce annually from 8,500,000 to 9,500,000 tons of pig iron. This is a production equal to half of the world's output in 1880. In that year Great Britain, which stood at the head of the producers of pig iron, made 7,749,233 tons of pig—not so much as can now be made by the United States Steel Corporation alone. Then the United States, which stood second, produced less than half the possible output of this single corporation. In 1897 this country, then at the head of the iron producers of the world, made more than 9,652,680 tons of pig iron, a trifle more than can be produced this year by the United States Steel Corporation. In 1901, when the country's production had reached 15,878,354 tons, this company's present furnaces could have produced more than half of the total. Its actual production was 6,460,847 tons.

After the pig iron is produced the corporation can manufacture every year in its present rolling mills and steel works, numbering 112, more than 8,000,000 tons of Bessemer and open-hearth steel. It makes more than a million tons of wire rods. The Shelby Steel Tube Company alone has a capacity for making annually 63,000,000 feet of tubes. The 16 wire-nail plants of the American Steel and Wire Company can turn out 12,385,000 kegs of nails.

Again, we can form some conception of the enormous proportions of this giant among the industries by comparing its capacity with the country's total production. In its more than 250 mills and finishing works it produced, in 1901, 70.2 per cent of the Bessemer and 59 per cent of the open-hearth steel which is made in this country; about 60 per cent of the steel rails; about the same proportion of the structural steel forms; 65 per cent of the plates and sheets of steel; virtually all of the hoops and cotton ties; it has hardly any competition in the manufacture of tin plate, because the American Tin Plate Company is the original tin-plate maker in the United States; it made 66 per cent of the wire nails produced in the country; all or very nearly all of the barbed and woven fence wire, because of its ownership of patents, and 78 per cent of the wire rods and wire.

So that we find that this one great industrial combination owns one-half of all the available iron ore in the United States, and has a complete monopoly of two articles used in daily consumption by the people, and can control the price of many other articles necessary for the people's use.

Mr. HILL. How does the gentleman reconcile what he is now saying with the fact that wire nails and cut nails have fallen off within the last twelve months about 35 cents a keg, and are to-day lower than they were ever known to be in the history of the United States?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I do not know that such is the fact.

Mr. HILL. Well, suppose it to be a fact, admit it to be a fact, and then go on and give your answer.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I will not admit anything of the kind. I know one thing—that these industrial combinations, according to their own statements, are selling their products abroad, in foreign markets, and selling them cheaper than they are sold at home. This has never been denied. It was admitted by Mr. Schwab, of the steel trust.

This combination of corporations, therefore, is in a position where it can control the markets of the country in certain articles of necessary use, and with the aid of a high protective tariff may absolutely destroy competition at home by lowering prices generally or in particular localities, and raise them again when competition ceases.

It was stated by Mr. Albert Shaw, in the January Century, that Attorney-General Knox had reported that there was no law to reach the steel trust; and if this be true we behold the spectacle of a single industrial unit, whose influence ramifies throughout the world, which holds and may hold in perpetuity one-half the available iron ore of the country, with a complete monopoly now in certain articles of necessity, and the people without a law to prevent further combinations or greater encroachments.

If the opinion of the Attorney-General is sound, this trust could absorb still other industries, yet widen and extend its control, and in the end could own all the iron ore of the country and hold it in perpetuity.

This is just as probable now as the organization of the United States Steel Corporation itself was ten years ago.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER TO REGULATE INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The power of Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce should never have been doubted, for if there is one principle more clearly and defininitely recognized in judicial opinion it is this very power.

Under our system of government the theory of State and national sovereignty is well understood.

In the States the power of regulation and control of commerce is supreme and exclusive, unless it partakes of an interstate character.

When it does, the jurisdiction of the Government is exclusive, and no State can prevent its entry or prohibit the sale of any article of commerce before it becomes commingled with the goods of a State without the consent of Congress.

Under what is called the police power the States may forbid the sale of an article within their limits, where the public welfare requires it, when the article has lost its original character and becomes commingled with the property of the State, but it is for the very reason that it has lost its interstate character.

So when the State of Iowa attempted to enforce a statute against the sale of spirituous liquors, the Supreme Court of the United States held that it was unconstitutional, as against goods in original form, as the power to regulate interstate commerce was exclusive in Congress, and that the State could not exercise that right without the assent of Congress. (See Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S., 100; and the cases there cited and distinguished. See also 125 U. S., 507; 15 Wall., 232.)

In the present session of Congress a bill has been introduced, and has passed the House, granting the power to the State which was denied in the leading case just cited.

The case of Knight v. The United States (156 U. S., 1), commonly known as the Sugar Refining Case, is often cited, and was relied upon by the former chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. Ray] and by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] in their reports already cited, as conclusive of the lack of constitutional power on the part of Congress, and as showing the necessity of a constitutional amendment.

In the report filed with the pending bill the gentleman from Maine, who makes the report [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], does not agree with these conclusions, and finds nothing in the Knight case limiting the power of Congress over the subject of interstate commerce.

The Knight case does decide that Congress has no power to limit production and manufacture within a State, even though the production and manufacture may constitute a monopoly and affect, therefore, interstate commerce.

But this is a wholly different thing to holding that Congress may not at once assume control and regulation of any article after it leaves the limits of a State and assumes an interstate character; nor is the power to be questioned because its exercise may affect production or manufacture within a State.

The converse of the proposition announced by Chief Justice Fuller in the Knight case must be equally true.

The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce was recognized and thus clearly stated:

> The Constitution does not provide that interstate commerce shall be free, but by the grant of this exclusive power to regulate it it was left free, except as Congress might impose restraints. Therefore it has been determined that the failure of Congress to exercise this exclusive power in any case is an expression of its will that the subject shall be free from restrictions or impositions upon it by the several States; and if a law passed by a State in the exercise of its acknowledged powers comes into conflict with that will, Congress and the State can not occupy the position of equal opposing sovereignties, because the Constitution declares its supremacy and that of the laws passed in pursuance thereof, and that which is not supreme must yield to that which is supreme.

We are also indebted to this opinion for the restatement of the qualification of the common-law rule as to monopoly and the power of Congress relative thereto:

> Congress is not confined to the common-law sense of the term as implying an exclusive control by authority of one branch of industry without legal right of any other person to interfere therewith by competition or otherwise, but that it includes engrossing as well as covers controlling the market by contracts, securing the advantage of selling alone or exclusively all or some considerable portion of a particular kind of merchandise or commodity to the detriment of the public, and that such contracts amount to that restraint of trade or commerce declared to be illegal.

It is further stated in this opinion:

> Again, all the authorities agree that in order to vitiate a contract or combination it is not essential that its result should be a complete monopoly. It is sufficient if it really tends to that end and to deprive the public of the advantages which flow from competition.

So when the question of the power of Congress came directly before the Supreme Court in the next leading case of Addyston Pipe and Steel Company v. United States (175 U. S., 211), commonly known as the Addyston Pipe Trust case, the principle was restated and the distinction drawn between the power of Congress to regulate production within a State and its power over the production when it entered into interstate commerce.

On the question of the jurisdiction of Congress and the States on the subject of interstate commerce Mr. Justice Peckham says:

> But upon the matter of interstate and foreign commerce and the proper regulation thereof, the subject being not alone national, but international, in its character, the great importance of having but one source for the law which regulates that commerce throughout the length and breadth of the land can not, in our opinion, be overestimated. Each State in that event would have complete jurisdiction over the commerce which was wholly within its borders, while the jurisdiction of Congress, under the provisions of the Constitution, over interstate commerce would be paramount and would include therein jurisdiction over contracts of the nature we have been discussing.

He also says:

As has frequently been said, interstate commerce consists of intercourse and traffic between the citizens and inhabitants of different States, and includes not only the transportation of persons and property, and the navigation of public waters for that purpose, but also the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities.

See also Gloucester-Ferry Company v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S., 196; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S., 1.

In the Addyston Pipe case the question was raised that the contract in restraint of trade, if made at all, was by individuals, and that the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution was in derogation of the personal liberty and rights of individuals. In reply to this suggestion, Mr. Justice Peckham said.

On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberty of the citizen is to some extent limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which, directly and substantially, and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

Further on, this language is used:

What sound reason can be given why Congress should have the power to interfere in the case of the State and yet have none in the case of the individual? Commerce is the important subject of consideration, and anything which directly obstructs and thus regulates that commerce which is carried on among the States, whether it is State legislation or private contracts between individuals or corporations, should be subject to the power of Congress in regulation of that commerce.

In his address at Pittsburg on the commerce clause of the Constitution, Attorney-General Knox illustrates its power thus:

Congress, under this power, prevents the importation or transportation of articles deemed injurious to the public welfare. Thus the laws subject the movement of explosives to safeguards and burdens, exclude impure literature and diseased cattle, convicts and contract labor, and scrutinize and prevent, or check, many foreign and interstate movements throughout the entire field of international and national intercourse, in the interests of all the people, on grounds of commercial, hygienic, or ethical policy.

He says, again:

If the Sherman law exhausted the power of Congress over monopolies, the American people find themselves hopelessly impotent, facing a situation fraught with the most alarming possibilities, with which neither the Federal nor the State government can deal.

The contribution of Mr. Knox to the question of the constitutional power of Congress which, if not used, to quote his language, "The unchecked aggression of the trusts would result in practical monopoly of the important business of the country," forms an oasis in the desert of Republican insincerity.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman think that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, has the power to destroy it?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. If it is necessary for the public welfare, yes, of course it has, and who doubts it as a lawyer?

Mr. PALMER. That is good. I am glad we have the gentleman there.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman doubt it?

Mr. PALMER. I do, certainly. I do not think the power to regulate carries with it the power to destroy.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Do not we prohibit the transportation of diseased cattle?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And destroy them?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. And do not we tax oleomargarine?

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman think that the Congress of the United States should have the right to destroy the entire commerce of the country?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I think the powers of Congress over interstate commerce are omnipotent, and the gentleman talks exactly like all Republicans talk, because he does not want any antitrust legislation. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. PALMER. Does the gentleman not come from a State which believes in State rights?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Yes; I believe in State sovereignty, but I do not want State sovereignty prostituted to the base uses of the trusts, and I believe the power of the Government is strong enough to control, and is exclusive of, interstate commerce, just as I think the States have the right and ought to control commerce within their borders. This is the trouble with the Republican party. Every time a question of this sort arises, some constitutional objection is made. We have the power. The question is whether there is virtue enough left in the Republican party to exercise that power.

In further reply to the gentleman, I do not doubt in the least that if Congress thought it was for the public welfare, and the business of a corporation was of such a character that Congress ought to act, it could absolutely say to a corporation organized in a State, "We will declare your interstate commerce unlawful." Do you doubt that proposition?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, yes.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. No man can doubt that proposition, according to the decisions.

Mr. PALMER. I believe in State rights to some extent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, when they are not involved. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Do you believe in the regulation of the trusts?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly, and I am one of the committee that reported this bill. I hope you will vote for it when the time comes.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I will vote for this bill if we can not get anything better, but it is a bill that is inconclusive and does not reach the questions in which the people are interested. The American people want the trusts controlled by mandatory legislation. They do not ask for the kind of publicity provided for in this bill. In other words, under the terms of this bill if corporations steal in public it is all right, just so they do not steal in the dark. Stealth by daylight is legal, but burglary in the nighttime is wrong, according to the publicity idea as there provided. If they make public their returns, nothing can harm them.

PRACTICAL REASONS FOR GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

The first reason why the Government should pass a law for the control of the interstate business of these great industrial combinations is because it is its constitutional and moral duty. The second is that without uniformity of State legislation no preventive or remedial legislation is possible.

Many of the States now have what are called antitrust laws of variable value, even if they were operative, but entirely wanting in uniformity. But all States in the Union save one could pass uniform laws, and one State fail or refuse, and that State should become the home of corporate combinations, as New Jersey has become, the legislation would be fruitless, because no State can prohibit commerce coming from another, and we are back again to the power of Congress and the necessity for its exercise.

The question is national in its character; it affects all the people in all the territory throughout the Union, and if monopoly is to be controlled and prevented, it must be by the strong arm of the National Government.

Mr. Chairman, the industrial conditions of the country demand earnest, prompt, and efficient legislation. The longer it is delayed the nearer we approach to socialism or something worse.

We should take warning by the past.

The ice trust brought suffering and death to the sick and poor when the price was put beyond their reach.

The machinations of the beef trust placed a necessity of life beyond the purse of labor, and the protest was loud, deep, and ominous.

The infamous coal trust caused untold suffering in centers dependent upon its supply, and the echoes of unrest and discontent are yet heard in the land.

Whatever weakens or destroys the faith of the people in good government brings us nearer to a day of awful reckoning.

Forces may be unleashed which no law can hold or compass. The time is now for the people through their representatives to assert that the creatures which they have made shall not turn to destroy their dearest rights.

The young student who conceived the thought of creating a man, dug in the church yards, went to the charnel houses and dissecting rooms until he got all the bones, ligaments, and every organ of the human body, and putting them together made a creature he called Frankenstein. He finally succeeded in infusing life in the monster and it grew into a being of enormous size and hideous mien, but it was soulless and had no human sympathy. It murdered the nearest relations and friends of its creator, and followed him to thwart his plans, and to bring misery and despair, and the author of its being was powerless against the dread and sinister influence.

The people have created corporations, without soul or human sympathy, and breathed life into their nostrils. Let them beware they prove not Frankensteins. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REID. Mr. Chairman, owing to the lateness of the hour I shall not detain the committee but a few minutes. I want to take up the time allotted to me to discuss a subject which I consider pertinent to the pending bill. A few days ago, when the Agricultural appropriation bill passed the House, I noticed it contained a provision of some half million of dollars for the Weather Bureau, and a sum of $30,000, I believe, for the Office of Good Roads Inquiry. It may cost considerably more money, Mr. Chairman, to prognosticate the weather than to collect and disseminate information and conduct experiments in the art of good-road building, but I doubt very much whether it will be attended with as good results.

The Weather Bureau may be all right, but it illustrates a story told to me a few days ago by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]. A negro boy asked his father did he believe in signs. The old man told him "No," he did not take much stock in signs. He said the trouble with the sign was that when you saw a sign you could not be sure that there was not some other sign around that you had overlooked that wholly liquidates the first sign. [Laughter.] Until the Weather Bureau can assure us when they see a sign that there is not some other sign around that liquidates the first sign on which they have prognosticated we will still be in doubt as to their forecast of the weather regardless of the fact that the bulletin announces it with confidence twenty-four hours ahead. [Laughter.]

It is very far from my purpose to oppose proper appropriation for this great department of our Government, but I do insist that a sufficient inquiry has not been made into the question of good roads, and it is to that subject, Mr. Chairman, that I desire to direct the attention of the committee for a few minutes.

For the last few years at least the subject of good roads has been regarded as of secondary importance. I am mindful of the fact that I am treading upon delicate ground when it is discussed with reference to national aid, and desire to say to begin with that I favor no bill that has for its object the embarkment of the National Government upon a system of road building that will amount to an encroachment of the Federal Government upon any of the rights of the States or that savors of paternalism in any degree. Neither will I favor any bill that turns over to the Federal Government the control of all or any of the common highways of the country, or charges it with the responsibility of their maintenance, and this without reference to any pending bill.

But when carefully considered, Mr. Chairman, national aid to road construction will be found to be open to fewer objections from a constitutional standpoint than even the appropriation of moneys to improve rivers and harbors and other purposes, the constitutionality of which is no longer challenged or denied. The truth is that national legislation upon this subject was begun at the very threshhold of our national history in the very necessity of the case, and would doubtless have become before this a definite and settled policy had it not been for the advent of the railroad, which was an enterprise within the reach of private capital and afforded opportunity for private investment.

Whether right or wrong, the constitutional questions involved have long since been settled, and it may be worthy of mention that the first legislation upon this subject was begun under the Administration of President Jefferson, who, March 29, 1806, approved the bill providing for the building of the old Cumberland road, the longest straight road ever projected or built by any nation, extending, as it did, a distance of 700 miles—from Cumberland, Md., to St. Louis, Mo.—and connecting the Atlantic seaboard with the waters of the Mississippi. The project commanded the ardent support of such patriots as Calhoun and Clay, Jefferson and Monroe, and was the subject of national appropriation during the Administrations of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. Stretching away to the westward, it was perhaps the strongest link that secured that great and at that time unknown country to the Union. It was the pathway of empire.

The population of the States west of the Ohio through which it went increased from less than a million to over three million and a half in a single generation after it was built. The story of the old Cumberland and its influence upon the history of this country, both industrial and political, is in itself an interesting theme. It has been written of it that—

> It is a monument of a past age, but like all other monuments it is interesting as well as venerable. It carried thousands of population and millions of wealth into the West, and more than any other material structure in the land served to harmonize and strengthen, if not to save, the Union.

And the building of this road was only one of a number for which the National Government appropriated money. From 1806 for thirty-two years Congress appropriated sums of money for other roads aggregating $1,600,000, besides the Cumberland, which cost about seven millions. There was the road from Detroit to Chicago, from Natchez to Nashville, from the frontier of Georgia to New Orleans, and from Memphis to the St. Francis River, in Arkansas. From 1854 down to the civil war $160,000 was spent on the roads in the Territories. In 1865, $140,000 was appropriated. And not only money, but grants of lands from time to time have been made to the States for the purpose of building roads, and grants of enough land to railroads have been made to make a half dozen large States of this Union in area. So the proposition that the National Government should contribute to the building of good roads is neither new nor unprecedented.

Mr. Monroe, in 1832, vetoed an appropriation bill for the old Cumberland road, but placed his veto on the ground that the bill went further than the mere application of the money. It amounted to the exercise of sovereignty which, in his opinion, the Federal Government did not possess. It provided for a system of tollgates and penalties and punishment for malicious injuries to the road. This, he said, Congress did not have the power to do. So far as the policy was concerned, he expressly approved it, and went so far as to recommend a constitutional amendment investing the Federal Government with the powers, upon the consent of the States, to exercise the authority. But so far as the application of money or lands to the purpose is concerned, it is not so much a question of constitutional authority, but a question as to the propriety and practicability of the scheme.

I understand that the proposition is beset with difficulties. To what extent the Federal Government may fairly be called upon to assist in the matter, how her help is to be equitably apportioned to the various States, whether according to population, extent, or area, or length and character of existing highways, are questions that will require most careful consideration and may not be satisfactorily solved at the beginning, but that it will come at no distant day in some form or other may as well be conceded. The trend of the times is in that direction, and if it can be done consistent with constitutional authority I know of no subject that can engage the attention of this body that will redound more to the interest of the whole people than the bettering of roads and highways of the rural districts.

Macaulay, the great English historian, has said:

> Of all inventions, the alphabet and printing press alone excepted, those inventions which abridge distance have done more for the civilization of our species. Every improvement of the means of locomotion benefits mankind morally and intellectually, as well as materially, and not only facilitates the interchange of various products of nature and art but tends to remove national and provincial antipathies and bind together all the branches of the great human family.

There is one way in which the Government can afford material aid to the States in the betterment of the common highways of the country, about which there can be no constitutional objection, and no question as to the ability of the Government to accomplish it. In 1893 Congress passed an act creating an office of road inquiry in the Department of Agriculture, the purpose of which office was to collect and disseminate information on the subject of road building, to conduct investigations, inquiries, and experiments regarding road material and road construction, and to encourage, by object lessons and otherwise, the building of better roads. And in my judgment this office, even within the short time of its existence, and with the very limited means and authority afforded it, has been of incalculable value to the movement.

I believe, sir, if proper provisions were made for the enlargement of the powers and duties of this office, and sufficient means placed at its disposal to carry out the purposes for which it was originated, no department of the Government could be made to contribute more to the building up and permanent improvement of the rural districts of this country. When we come to think about it, Mr. Chairman, every dollar of the hundreds of millions appropriated for rivers and harbors and every acre granted to encourage the building of railroads would be futile if it were not for the common roads and highways of the country. Render them impossible of passage for a fortnight and the wheels of commerce would stop, looms and spindles would cease to revolve, railroad cars would stand idle in their yard, and merchant vessels would lag in the harbor for want of cargoes to carry to the seas.

The removal of the raw material from the forest and the field, and mill and the mine, is the very first and, up to the present time, the most costly and difficult step in the whole system of transportation. There is not a State in the Union that is not retarded in its growth and development on account of impassable highways. Legislation for good roads is legislation directly beneficial to the agricultural class, and upon this class is built the whole edifice of industrial structure. The cost of all that is produced is always largely influenced, and in a vast majority of cases absolutely controlled by the cost of transportation.

Those who have made it their business to inform themselves upon the subject tell us that the cost of hauling a ton of average freight 1 mile over a good broken-stone road is 8 cents, that the cost of hauling the same ton over a mile of ordinary sandy road is 64 cents. In other words, the people of this country pay 56 cents per ton per mile "mud tax," as it has been sometimes called, for every ton of freight they move a distance of 1 mile. Calculated for the entire country, and the amount saved by the construction of good roads would be shown to be beyond comprehension. The sum total could not be less that the enormous sum of $600,000,000 annually, or forty times as much as the entire Louisiana purchase cost, from which was carved 13 great States besides the Indian Territory.

"A very striking example of the economy of building macadamized roads came under my observation recently. A machine weighing 16,000 pounds was drawn 4 miles on the Brook turnpike, a macadamized road. It required 4 mules (4,000 pounds to the mule) and one and one-half hours of time, at a cost of 15 cents per mule per hour, or a total cost for 4 miles of 90 cents. After traveling 4 miles on the macadamized turnpike the route lay a little less than 2,000 feet on a dirt road. To travel this 2,000 feet it was necessary to use 10 of the best mules and 7 men, and with this force it took nine hours to complete the journey. The cost was $19.80, at which rate 4 miles would have cost $209.08, or, in other words, $208.18 absolutely thrown away for want of a macadamized road. A macadamized road, such as would have prevented this enormous waste of money, would have cost about $100 per mile for every foot of width; that is, 12-foot road, $1,200 per mile; 16-foot road, $1,600 per mile, etc. One can well realize from this the enormous sum wasted annually by our present impassable highways."—[Bulletin from office of Road Inquiry.]

There is no nation of antiquity, of any considerable consequence, that did not devote a large part of its resources to the building of good roads. Some of them constructed thousands of years ago still exist as monuments to the greatness of the nation that built them. From Babylon to Rome and from Rome to France the greatest nations have left their impress upon the surface of the earth in the form of indestructible roads. Upon them depended the commercial and military strength of the State. Napoleon built for France the finest system of highways in the world, and they remain so to-day. They are the pride of the French engineer, and place France in the forefront of nations in the adoption of horseless vehicles and the modern methods of transportation upon highways.

In the building of railroads we have far outstripped other nations, and in the common highways, without which railroads could not exist, we are sadly behind. Let a few days of severe weather render the country roads impassable and the freight receipts of every railroad in the country fall suddenly off to the minimum. And in this fact is found the secret of the encouragement given the roads movement by the great railroad systems of the country. With commendable self-interest they have rendered every assistance to the Government to aid her in conducting experiments and carrying on this work. The cost of road construction is by far less to-day than it was a decade ago, due to the improvement in road-building machinery, and road-building material from place to place, as well as the improvement in chemical analysis and engineering. The day has come when the general revival of interest in road building will force the subject upon this body and the legislatures of the country for consideration.

The character of roads demanded for the successful operation of the rural free-delivery system, and the cheap and rapid transportation afforded by bicycles and horseless carriages insure a constant agitation of the subject until it will inevitably result in some means by which this great work can be thoroughly accomplished. And I believe that in its accomplishment will be found the solution of problems and averting of many dangers that now threaten and disturb. It is at least a sure method to relieve the congested centers of population and turn the tide toward the rural districts, where it properly belongs. It insures that equilibrium in the country's development that alone bespeaks a healthy and permanent growth. It means a more equal distribution of wealth and resources. It builds up the country side, and invites the crowded and discontented from the smoke and whirl of cities to the tranquil peace and wide pure air of field and forest.

In my own State, Mr. Chairman, the people are waking up to the importance of this great subject, and are calling upon legislators, both State and national, to give it their attention. And there is no State in all this Union that stands so much in need of good highways or that would receive greater benefit from their improvement than the State of Arkansas. More miles of railroads have been built in Arkansas in the last few years than in any State in the Union, and millions of money is now being spent upon the improvement of old roads; and yet, sir, within the very sound of the whistle of the locomotive stand vast forests of hard wood, cypress, and pine, inexhaustible beds of coal and minerals, the finest orchard lands in the world, fields of valuable grasses and grains, much of which is rendered comparatively worthless and suffered in a large measure to waste and decay for want of passable highways.

Through the courtesy of the Office of Road Inquiry I have today been furnished with some figures relating to this subject for the State of Arkansas. The best figures obtainable upon the subject show that in the State of Arkansas the average length of haul from farm to market is 24 miles. The average weight in pounds for one 2-horse team is given at 1,419 pounds. The average cost per ton per mile is 21 cents; therefore the average cost per ton for the total distance of 24 miles from farm to market is $5.04. Now, from the census report of 1890, which I will pause long enough to say does not overstate the case by any means, the total tonnage of the principal farm products alone in 1890, in Arkansas, was 2,365,905 tons. At $5.04 per ton it costs the farmers of Arkansas $11,924,161.20 to move these products over the average distance of 24 miles from the farm to the market.

These figures are indeed startling, but, sir, they by no means overstate the facts. The hundred incidental inconveniences of bad roads, the cost of which can not be measured in dollars and cents, are not taken into consideration. At a conservative estimate for the State of Arkansas, two-thirds of this enormous expense might be saved to the people of that State by the building of proper highways. In less than four years the sum would furnish the State with as good a system of roads as there is on the face of the earth.

The blessings, moral and intellectual as well as industrial, that would flow from such conditions we can neither measure nor comprehend. Stately farmhouses and comfortable country homes would take the place of cabins in the valleys and on the hillsides, the breeding of fine stock would be encouraged and promoted, and the farm and the country would develop a hundred attractions it does not now possess. I hope, sir, the day is at hand when the subject will receive the attention it deserves and proper means be devised by which the nation and the States may cooperate in the work. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16990) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF BILL TO SENATE.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 30, 1903.

Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we give Thee all honor and glory and praise forever and ever. Thy name is above every name. From Thee cometh every good and perfect gift.

We bless Thee to-day for the type of citizenship which has been produced by American institutions, for every refining influence that surrounds the home life, for the ample means for the education of the people, and for the high ideals of civil and social honor.

We praise Thee for the master spirits who have in times past wrought their thought and life into American law, and going to their reward above have left to us the rich inheritance of their lives. Their memory abides as a gentle benediction upon those who follow their noble example, and as an inspiration amid the pressing cares of the present. Help us to emulate their lofty deeds and to honor them by our endeavor to extend and perpetuate their unselfish patriotism. With every thought of those who have been the beacon lights in our history, with every tender memory of their presence in this Chamber, may we have the inspiration of this cloud of witnesses commanding us to yet follow in the path of duty and honor.

Let Thy blessing rest upon every thought of this Senate to-day. May all redound to the honor and glory of Thy name. For Christ's sake. Amen.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR JAMES M'MILLAN.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, in conformity with the notice already given, I ask the Senate to consider at this time the following resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan submits resolutions which will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. JAMES McMILLAN, late a Senator from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect at the conclusion of these exercises the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, the life of Senator McMILLAN fell somewhat short of the allotted span. He died at the age of 64. If it be true, however, that the value of a human life is determined not by years, but by deeds, then the sixty-four years of his life were all that could be desired and filled to the full the measure of human ambition. They were ample to develop and round out the dominating traits of his character and leave their enduring impress upon the private and public affairs in which he bore so conspicuous a part. More than this, they were sufficient for the maturity of those manly virtues which so endeared him to his associates and make the memory of his life a priceless heritage to his family and friends.

The parents of Senator McMILLAN came from Scotland in 1834, and settled at Hamilton, in the Province of Ontario, Canada, where in 1838 JAMES McMILLAN was born. The elder McMillan brought with him the rugged characteristics of the Scotch race, and by his sterling qualities secured the confidence and respect of the community in which he lived, and became a recognized factor in the industrial affairs of the Province. Identified with the construction of her railways, the establishment and management of banks and other industrial and financial enterprises, he soon won for himself a place of influence in the business affairs of the community in which he resided. It was in the midst of such environments that the son, JAMES McMILLAN, was reared, and these surroundings were potent in shaping and molding his course in all the after years. He early imbibed a taste for business affairs, and although the way was open to him to acquire the learning of the schools, the bent of his mind was in another direction, and led him at an early day to engage in the active pursuits of a business life.

As a mere lad at the age of 13 he became a clerk in a mercantile establishment in Hamilton, the duties of which position he discharged with fidelity and ability, and in 1855, at the early age of 17, he determined to make his own way to fortune and fame, and leaving the parental roof settled in Detroit, Mich., the city and State destined to become his future home. Here he at once entered upon his business career, beginning at the bottom of the ladder, but with firm hand and resolute step he quickly reached the topmost round. He manifested such rare capacity and business integrity in subordinate positions as to attract the attention of his employers, and when but 19 years of age was called to the responsible position of purchasing agent of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad, then the chief railroad line in the State, and when the extension of the road was determined upon he was intrusted with the financial management of the enterprise, making the purchases and taking charge of the force engaged in the construction of the work.

In all these varied and responsible positions he acquitted himself with marked ability, foreshadowing the remarkable business career which awaited him. Gaining the confidence of the capitalist by his upright dealings and conservative judgment, he early became connected with many of the leading industries of his city and State, and took a master hand in their development and control. His unquestioned integrity, his business sagacity, his stability of purpose, his unflagging energy, and his indomitable pluck coupled with a self-reliance that no obstacle could impede and no misfortune disturb, made him a commanding figure in the industrial affairs of his city and State. These dominating qualities of head and heart won for him recognition with his business associates and rapid advancement to places of responsibility and power. His financial success was already assured.

At the head of numerous and gigantic manufacturing establishments; manager of great corporations in his own and other States, which he had been instrumental in organizing and promoting; director in banking institutions; president of railway and steamship companies—he attained an unquestioned place in the industrial field, which he continued to hold with ever-increasing power until the hour of his death. A leading journal of Detroit, speaking in his lifetime of his business achievements, fittingly said of him:

> Mr. MCMILLAN is possessed of an abundant fortune. He earned it by hard work and bold and intelligent enterprises, which have not only made him wealthy, but have added tens of millions to the wealth of Detroit, furnished steady and remunerative employment to thousands of his fellow-citizens, and supported tens of thousands of families. He has added to the beauty of the city, not only by the construction of factories where labor is employed, but by the construction of many handsome business blocks, which are an ornament to Detroit. * * * In scores of cases that every business man can recall he has taken broken enterprises which other men's incompetence had ruined, and has built them up into successful concerns, to the profit and enrichment of the whole city.

His business career left nothing to be desired, and at the age of 64 he held a commanding position in the industrial world, with an ample fortune for himself and his children.

He was not only successful in acquiring a fortune, but was also a most liberal giver. The accumulation of great riches not infrequently engenders a spirit of greed and selfishness which make their possessor indifferent to public or private needs. No such spirit found a lodgment in Senator MCMILLAN'S breast. In his philosophy the possession of riches imposed upon its possessor obligations to the citizen and the State which could not be ignored. He dispensed public and private benefactions with a liberal hand and his heart was always open to the appeals of the deserving poor. His giving was as unostentatious as his life was simple and retiring. It is said that when absent from his home, not infrequently for protracted periods, it was his custom to enjoin upon the head of the associated charities of his city to see to it that no deserving family be allowed to suffer and to draw on him for whatever was necessary to furnish needed relief. He was a regular contributor to the associated charities not only of his own city, but of the city of Washington, in which he took during the entire period of his public career a deep and abiding interest. His charities, however, were not limited or confined to individual instances of distress which perchance fell under his notice in the everyday walks of life, but his benefactions took a wider range and encompassed a broader field, reaching beyond the demands of the present to the possible exigencies of the future. A single instance will serve to exemplify his broad philanthropy.

An unfortunate cripple, friendless and penniless, one day appealed to him for financial aid to enable him to secure admission to some hospital where he might obtain surgical treatment and necessary care. The requisite funds were promptly supplied and admission secured. This incident, however, brought forcefully home to Senator MCMILLAN the fact that the city of Detroit had no free hospital where the unfortunate poor could be admitted and cared for "without money and without price." This condition appealed to his generous, sympathetic nature and prompted him to immediately inaugurate a movement which, with the generous cooperation of others, resulted in the erection of Grace Hospital—a memorial to the memory of the sainted dead and a free asylum to the unfortunate living.

But his benefactions were not confined to instances of charity. He sought opportunity to give where by so doing he could promote the interests of deserving young men. His business offices were the training school for young men of business ability, and he always counted it among the greatest pleasures of his life that he had been able to assist so many young men to a successful business career.

In his political affiliations he was always an ardent, consistent Republican, but he was never an extreme partisan. To the fundamental principles of his party he was devotedly attached, and to them he maintained a steadfast allegiance in victory or defeat and sought by every legitimate means at his command to secure their establishment and continuance in governmental affairs. It is doubtful if in the beginning he had any ambition for public life or dreamed of political preferment, but when the standard of his party fell from the strong hand of the intrepid Chandler, and his party called him to duty, he took the work of party leadership with the same courage and confidence that had characterized his business life and in more than one hard-fought battle led his party to victory. He exhibited in the political field the same sagacity and fixedness of purpose which have characterized his business life, and the great body of the party came to lean upon him with implicit confidence and followed his directions with unquestioned faith. He became the recognized leader of his party in the State, as he had been the acknowledged master of the business interests intrusted to his charge.

His fidelity to his party and the confidence reposed in him by the great body of the people singled him out for promotion to a seat in this body, and on the 4th day of March, 1889, he took his place in this Chamber as a Senator from the State of Michigan, a position which he retained, with ever-increasing influence, until the day of his death. Thrice elected to the Senate, and sometimes by the unanimous vote of the legislature, he retained in a remarkable degree the allegiance of the people and commanded their universal confidence and esteem. Of his services in this body others with more extended knowledge can more fittingly speak; but I hazard nothing in saying that, while not a ready debater on the floor of the Senate, yet his words always commanded attention and carried conviction, while in the committee room, where all legislation is formulated and matured, he was a wise and helpful counselor and a recognized power in constructive legislation.

His long training in business affairs gave him a grasp of public questions which few possess. He brought to the discharge of his legislative duties in this body, always important and many times perplexing, not the learning of the university nor the uncertain conclusions of the mere theorist, but he commanded rather a practical and comprehensive knowledge of business affairs in all their varied ramifications, acquired in the school of experience, which enabled him to grasp and comprehend the fundamental principles upon which all just and enduring legislation is founded. He was, therefore, specially fitted for the discharge of legislative duties in these times. This is preeminently a business age—an era of marvelous industrial activity and development, giving rise to new and complicated conditions requiring for their adjustment the most patient examination and conservative judgment.

Could the life of Senator MCMILLAN have been spared and prolonged to the close of the term for which he was elected, enabling him to participate in the deliberations of this body in connection with the industrial problems now confronting us, I have no question but that his long and varied experience in business affairs, his incomparable judgment and conservative character would have contributed in no small degree to their just and successful solution. But his untimely death has deprived the country of his wise and helpful judgment. He will be missed in the Senate, in the committee room, in the councils of his party, in the business arena, in the marts of trade, in the State and the Nation, and most of all in the now broken circle of family and friends, who will hold his memory in enduring affection through all the years to come.

As we looked into his face for the last time and recalled his manly virtues, his Christian character, and his exemplary life, our lips involuntarily voiced the words of Tennyson:

> O iron nerve to true occasion true,
> O fall'n at length that tower of strength
> Which stood four-square to all the winds that blew!

But on such an occasion speech is impotent.

> Nothing can measure his high character but heaven;
> No monument set off his memories
> But the eternal substance of his virtues—
> To which I leave him.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, this day has been set apart by the Senate as a memorial day to enable his late associates in this body to give proper expression of their appreciation of the work, the worth, and the public services of the late Senator MCMILLAN during the period of his membership here as a Senator from the State of Michigan. I wish to contribute briefly to this expression. These exercises are not perfunctory in their character.

They are based upon the friendship and esteem of his associates for him as a Senator and as a man, and to enable them to give utterance to their appreciation of the value of his work here, and of his counsel upon the public questions which from time to time have appeared for consideration and decision by the Senate.

His colleague [Mr. BURROWS] has spoken at large upon the leading incidents and events of his life. These disclose that he was essentially "the architect of his own fortune," and that by his own unaided efforts he made his way to the high position he held at the time of his death. He was a business man in the broadest sense, and achieved great success as such before coming to the Senate.

He was born of Scotch parents in one of the Canadian provinces. When still a young man he removed to Michigan, and made his home in Detroit. He quickly won the confidence and esteem of its leading business men by integrity and industry and by showing capacity and foresight as to what could be done and what ought to be done for the growth and development of that city.

These characteristics soon enabled him to associate himself with others having like qualities, and also having capital to invest in enterprises which he believed would be remunerative. So at an early age he became largely interested in some of the most prosperous manufactories of the city, many of them being organized by him, and he was intrusted by others with large affairs, in that way soon becoming one of the leading factors in the business of that community.

He became interested in the transportation interests on the Great Lakes, providing vessels for a constantly increasing commerce, and he also connected himself with, and became financially interested in, several of the banks of the city. All these interests were closely interwoven with the growth of Detroit.

He took a deep interest in the municipal affairs of the city, especially as related to its development and beautification. Anyone now visiting Detroit will recognize it as one of the most beautiful, if not the most beautiful, city in the United States outside of this capital; its streets and avenues radiating from a common center and splendidly improved, leading to parks and spaces, beautified with drives and walks, lawns and trees—all for the use, comfort, and recreation of the people. He gave much attention to this subject and his mind and heart were in the work.

Detroit was originally planned by the same accomplished engineer who laid out the city of Washington, but a plan on paper is of little value, as we know, unless there is energy, public spirit, and good taste in its execution, coupled with some sacrifice by the taxpayers, whoever they may be, to provide the necessary means for such improvement. Senator MCMILLAN favored such expenditures, believing them to be wise, useful, and beneficial. He contributed largely to public and private beneficences, founding hospitals and providing for their maintenance.

These characteristics made him a leading and distinguished citizen of his home city of Detroit and of the State of Michigan. His enterprise, his success in business, and his beneficences were not confined to the city in which he lived, but were extended to many parts of the State of Michigan. Thus, he was well known in his own State, and generally in the Northwest, before he came to the Senate, for his business activity, energy, and success, as well as for his philanthropy.

Absorbed in business as he was during the earlier period of his life, he did not, as I understand, take a very active part in what are usually called the political affairs of the State, but as a Republican he supported the leading policies of his party and contributed largely to its success.

When the late Senator Zachariah Chandler, who had rendered his State and country distinguished service in the Senate and in the Cabinet during a most critical period in our history, and who at that time was regarded as the most eminent citizen of the State of Michigan, relinquished the chairmanship of the Republican State central committee, Mr. MCMILLAN was fitly chosen as its chairman, which brought him into the active politics of the State, to which position he was many times reelected, though neither seeking nor holding public office.

A vacancy occurring in the Senate in 1889 he was elected by his party as a member of this body, having been unanimously chosen by the Republican members of the legislature, the people of that State believing what we know by observation and experience, that those who are successful in their own business affairs because of their enterprise, energy, and probity, have the training and the qualifications which are of the greatest value in the consideration of the many public questions which are necessarily submitted here for decision, as all the great interests of our country are affected for good or ill by our legislation from year to year or by our failure to legislate when the public necessity requires.

Though the late Senator MCMILLAN came here with little knowledge, perhaps, of the traditions and methods whereby legislation is accomplished or fails, he came well equipped for the real duties of the place, having a wide knowledge of the material interests of our country as respects its varied productions and their distribution, as well as of the great currents of trade, both internal and external. These qualities soon became known to his colleagues by association in the committee room and on the floor of the Senate, and consequently he early took high rank as a Senator in this body.

On his becoming a member of the Senate he was appointed a member of the Committees on Agriculture, District of Columbia, and Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and was made chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, all of these being committees of importance.

The Senator's activity and interest in the growth and beautification of his home city naturally led him to take a deep interest in the local affairs of the District of Columbia, and he soon became the leading spirit in the consideration of all questions relating to the District coming before that committee. He became active in promoting improvements by opening and improving streets and avenues and by improving and beautifying the parks and open spaces for the health, comfort, and recreation of the people dwelling or sojourning here.

He also took an active interest in the water supply, the sewerage system, and other general improvements of like character. Of the first named, after an exhaustive examination by his committee of the various filtration systems, he made a report recommending a plan for such filtration, which was adopted by Congress and is now in process of execution, which will give the city of Washington and its people, within the next two years at farthest, a full supply of pure water now so much needed. His zeal in behalf of these various improvements was most conspicuous after he became chairman of the committee, in 1895.

He devoted much time during the last years of his service to the promotion of the general beautification of the city of Washington by having a comprehensive plan prepared, under the direction of his committee, with the view that all subsequent improvements should be made as nearly as practicable in accordance with such plan, so that the money gathered here by local taxation or by appropriation from the general Treasury should be expended, whether in the immediate or more distant future, according to such plan, so that instead of making improvements in a haphazard way future improvements should be made in accordance with a comprehensive scheme, having in view convenience, order, system, utility, and beautification. It was not intended or expected that this plan, thus worked out by the aid of skilled architects would be completed for many years, but that when completed the streets, avenues, parks, spaces, and public buildings would be so coordinated and correlated as to make this capital one of the most beautiful, if not the most beautiful, in the world, and worthy in every way of the great country whose power and glory it symbolizes. This was the hope of the late Senator, Mr. MCMILLAN, and that it will in the main be realized as time goes on I have no reason to doubt.

Although Senator MCMILLAN gave constant and assiduous attention to the affairs of this District, a few instances of which I have enumerated, and because of it won the affections of its people, he in no wise neglected the wider interests of the entire country or of the great section of which Michigan constitutes a part.

His experience in the building and running of ships on the Great Lakes led him to take a deep interest in the rebuilding of our Navy, and he was assigned to the first vacancy in the Republican membership of the Naval Committee, where he performed signal service in the consideration and perfection of measures looking to a reasonably rapid growth of our Navy, and was a valuable member of that committee at the time of his death.

About the same time he also became a member of the important Committee on Commerce, having charge of all the great subjects relating to our waterways, rivers, harbors, etc., and making large appropriations during each Congress for their improvement. Living midway of the Great Lakes, he had special and intimate personal knowledge of the increasing needs of the rapidly growing commerce of that region, and contributed largely of this knowledge and his own experience in the adjustment of measures affecting it, and his judgment respecting such measures had great weight. But upon that committee, as upon every other, his vision was wide enough to include the material interests of the whole country, and he favored making appropriations in aid of our commerce wherever they could properly be made to enlarge and expand it. Such are the vicissitudes of the committees of the Senate that, although placed upon that committee as late as 1895, at the time of his death he stood second in rank to its present able and efficient chairman.

At the beginning of the present Congress Senator MCMILLAN, in addition to the other duties assigned him, was made a member of the Committee on Appropriations, an important service, for which he was well equipped. Here he rendered valuable assistance in the consideration of bills appropriating money during the last session, and notably in aiding in the preparation of a measure revising the tax system of the District of Columbia, exceptional conditions requiring such revision on the District appropriation bill. The loss of his service on that committee is and will be deeply deplored.

From this brief recital it will be seen how important was the legislative career of our departed friend, and how closely he was related to all the great measures considered by the various committees of which he was a member and finally crystallized into law by the two Houses of Congress.

It must be said of him that he was constant, assiduous, and patient in the examination and investigation of every subject committed to his care, and that his judgment and counsel were of great value, bringing, as he did, to the consideration of all subjects wide knowledge, great experience, and sound common sense.

In all his relations with his associates in the Senate he was amiable and courteous in a marked degree, considerate of their views and opinions, and he invariably sought to be impartial in his judgments, without reference to locality or to party differences.

These qualities won for him the esteem and affection of all his associates here, and his loss is deeply deplored by every Senator who served with him.

I have spoken chiefly of Senator MCMILLAN as a Senator; but that is not all that should be said of him in giving an outline of his character.

He was an ideal man in his conduct in all the varied relations of life. He was a just man, following the Golden Rule in all his transactions and associations. There was no man whose character was more spotless, whose sense of honor and justice was more keen, who contributed more liberally, according to his means, to public and private charity, or who was more willing to relieve distress as it appeared. Though unassuming in manner, he was dignified and well poised. No one feared to approach him on any subject, knowing that he was certain to receive respectful attention. Whole souled and sympathetic, those in distress were sure to find in him sympathy and relief. Generous but unostentatious in his charities, he was always contributing liberally to worthy objects.

Socially he was a general favorite and always a welcome guest. His home was a most agreeable and hospitable one, where friends and acquaintances were always cordially welcomed. Genial and warm-hearted in his nature, he was fond of the society of his friends and companions, deriving constant enjoyment from his agreeable intercourse with them. Here his manners were easy, prepossessing, and unaffected. He possessed a charming and winning personality. There was a warmth and directness in what he said and did that won and held the esteem and affection of those with whom he came in contact.

He was a valued friend—none more faithfully cherished, none more loyal and true. His friends knew well that, whether absent or present, no disparaging suggestion would come from him, nor was he ever found wanting in fidelity and zeal on their behalf when occasion required.

In his home he was unexcelled in virtue and purity. He was the guide and exemplar of a lovely household, with a devoted wife of high intelligence and amiable disposition, sympathizing with and aiding him in all his ambitions, struggles, and successes. Grouped around them were devoted children, always ready to contribute their part to make the household an ideal one, free from the slightest friction or discord. The atmosphere there was pure and healthful. Whoever crossed its threshold found a hearty welcome and a genial hospitality. His noble and generous example in all these respects may well be emulated by those who survive him.

In that home his death left a deep and abiding sorrow, and with it is blended the sorrow felt in this Chamber by all who had the fortune to be associated with him and who felt the kindly touch of his companionship. His loss will be deplored, not only by the people of his own city and State, but by the people of the entire country.

We to-day pay tribute to his eminent public service, to his worth as a Senator and as a man, and will long cherish his many noble qualities of mind and heart. To me the death of Senator MCMILLAN is a peculiar and personal grief, for I knew him long and loved him well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, again the Senate of the United States is called upon to suspend its legislative duties and labors to pay the just tribute of respect, friendship, and honor to the memory of a deceased member, Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN, late United States Senator from the State of Michigan.

Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN was born on May 12, 1838, in Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, of Scotch parents, who emigrated from Scotland in 1836 and settled in Hamilton.

His father, William McMillan, was prominent in railroad and business affairs, and gave his son James the best educational facilities obtainable preparatory to a professional career in life.

The son, however, had definite ideas of his own for his future life work.

From his parents he inherited a strong body, a vigorous, well-balanced mind, steady, persevering energy, laudable ambition, exemplary habits, high moral ideals, and self-reliance.

At the age of 14 he left school and was apprenticed to a hardware merchant, and faithfully and industriously served his probation of four years, during the last year having practically control of the business.

His apprenticeship ended, he had flattering business offers made him in his native land, which he declined. Believing there were much better opportunities for his future success and life work in the United States than in his own country, he came to Detroit, Mich., a stranger among strangers.

He secured employment as a clerk in a wholesale hardware store and gave the business his closest attention for two years, when the panic of 1857 compelled the company to retrench, and Mr. MCMILLAN had to go, with many others. His thorough business qualifications had become recognized, and he soon secured the position of purchasing agent for the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad, the duties of which he discharged with such fidelity and integrity as to attract the attention and admiration of Mr. Samuel C. Ridley, who was the contractor for the construction of the railroad from Lowell to Grand Haven, and who secured his service to employ men, purchase supplies, and transact the financial business. Whilst engaged in this work in the absence of the contractor, he had an ordeal to test his young manhood, practical experience, and sound judgment.

Some pressing contract work had to be done promptly. The men employed went on a strike and quit work.

Undaunted and undismayed, young MCMILLAN made his appeal to the striking men, and by his open, frank, manly, honest, sensible talk and unassuming ways he induced the strikers to return to their work and achieved a decisive victory, when only 20 years old, in a situation which would have been a severe test for a much older and more experienced man. When the contract was completed, in 1861, he declined an offer of the same contractor and went back to his former position as purchasing agent. He had now been married to Miss Mary Wetmore, a most estimable and worthy young lady, and went to housekeeping, on a salary of $60 per month, in a modest little house in the rear of the palatial residence afterwards acquired and in which he resided at the time of his decease, and from whose back windows he could look down upon the humble home in which he and his young bride began their married life with economy, frugality, and industry, hoping, aspiring, and laboring for more prosperous days and conditions. He regularly attended the Presbyterian Church and gained the confidence, esteem, and respect of the good people, and never lost them to the day of his death.

His pathway to success in business affairs was not strewn with flowery beds of ease and constant success.

He had his trials and failures. His unquestioned integrity, his close attention and devotion to his duties, his practical, common-sense judgment, his honorable business methods, his straightforward, manly, unassuming ways, and his genial, cordial, friendly disposition inspired universal respect and confidence and enabled him to triumph in the end over all failures and reverses and to achieve wonderfully lucrative results for himself as well as for many others with whom he became associated in the many business corporations and enterprises in which he engaged and with which he became associated. Detroit is a large manufacturing center. Many of the largest industries of the city owe their initiative to JAMES MCMILLAN, in which he was interested either as stockholder, director, or officer. To read the list of these industries and enterprises in which he was so engaged is like reading a fairy tale. We wonder how it was possible for him to have done so and to have become so potential a factor in their management. His financial success was not attained by penuriousness. On the contrary, he was liberal and generous to churches, schools, and all charitable and eleemosynary enterprises.

These numerous business enterprises and investments were necessarily a severe strain upon both his mental and physical powers. Notwithstanding these constant demands upon his time and energy, he always took a lively interest in public affairs.

Politically Senator MCMILLAN was a strong Republican, but never partisanly offensive. In 1874 he began an active participation in political affairs, was a member of the Republican State central committee, and in 1879 he succeeded Hon. Zachariah Chandler as chairman of the State central committee, and was repeatedly reelected to the same position.

In 1889 he was the unanimous choice of the Republican members of his State legislature, and was elected to succeed Hon. Thomas W. Palmer for the term beginning March 4, 1889. In 1895 he received every vote in the joint legislative convention for reelection. He was reelected in 1901 for the term expiring on March 3, 1907.

At the time of his death he was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and a member of the Committees on Appropriations, Coast and Insular Survey, Commerce, Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, Naval Affairs, and Relations with Cuba.

He was an industrious, intelligent, faithful, and worthy Senator, and took an active part in shaping the legislation and conducting the business of the Senate, and wielded a strong influence.

From a party standpoint his speeches on the controverted questions of the tariff and finance were forceful and effective.

He indulged in no oratorical display, but relied upon plain statements of facts and figures, and arguments therefrom, and was methodical and painstaking in his duties and his efforts.

My personal acquaintance with him began with his entrance in the Senate, and as the years passed by and our duties drew us into personal and official relations our friendship and confidence grew and strengthened and we became warm personal friends. I respected, admired, and loved him for his many noble, manly, cordial, genial traits and characteristics. I was sincerely grieved when I read in the morning press the announcement of his untimely death in the prime of life, in the meridian of his usefulness in the country and among the people of his adoption, and in the fullness of the honors his State and the people of his country could bestow upon him. It was my sad privilege to be one of the members of the Senate appointed to attend his mortal remains to their last resting place in the city of his adoption, among the people with whom he had been intimately associated from his boyhood to his mature manhood in all the varied relations of life, as husband, father, citizen, business man, political leader, and United States Senator.

The very large number of people of all conditions who assembled to attend the last sad rites and their expressions of sorrow and grief were strong and unmistakable manifestations of their respect, confidence, admiration, and love for their dead friend, and verify that "A good name is better than precious ointment." While we sincerely mourn his death and tender to his stricken wife and family condolence, it is most pleasant to be justified in pointing the youth of our great country and good people to the useful, successful, honorable, and illustrious career of Hon. JAMES MCMILLAN as an inspiring example of the possibilities before them under our benign systems of government, national and State, the best ever yet devised by human wisdom for a free, independent, and intelligent people.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, as we understood Senator MCMILLAN, he was a good man, a just man, and, as God knows him, we believe that through His grace, he is a just man made perfect, a standard that no man can attain to through his unaided effort.

It is what is left to us of the record of his life, his works, and his example that we are permitted to speak; and it is a happiness that we can speak, without reserve and with pleasure, of his character and his conduct as a Senator.

No man has lived, or will live, whose abilities, learning, purity of character, or of speech, or thought, or action, lift him above the true measure of the dignity of a Senator of the United States, and no breadth or depth of learning or wisdom with which men may be endowed will reach beyond the scope of the demands of that great office.

In statesmanship and jurisprudence, in the art of government with civic or military abilities, in the duties of the world's household, where all nations comprise a family, the American Senator has a place that is as high and influential as that of any potentate, and his voice is heard in the councils of kingdoms and empires, on questions that affect all nations, though it is uttered in the executive sessions of the Senate with closed doors.

In those great powers the fate of nations and of limitless millions of posterity may hang upon his single vote.

In legislation he is the peer of the direct representatives of the people in Congress assembled. The scope and majestic sovereignty of this power is beyond description in words or by any reference to other systems of government.

Eighty-five millions of people, furnishing through local organizations the motive power of this great Republic, yet so restraining it that it can not lawfully do hurt to the least of them, and inspiring a wonderful representative sovereign power with wisdom and vitality drawn from the minds and hearts of a great race, are the true fountain springs of the legitimate government of mankind.

When this vast and varied aggregation of mental, moral, and civil forces is analyzed and the strength of each fiber is accounted for in the great result, the House of Representatives of the people is not less powerful than the greatest tribunals that have ever assembled.

The Senate shares with them these great functions and powers in a form more concentrated, in which the States, as constitutional sovereignties, are equal in power throughout the Republic.

This union of popular and State power in the Senate, and its coordinate relations with the House of Representatives, comprises a political supremacy, resting in Congress, that has no superior and is subject to no restraint, except the limitations of the Constitution and the powers reserved to the States and to the people. The Senate, therefore, is conspicuous for the breadth of its influence in government and for its strength.

Our members are so few that our responsibilities are, individually, very great.

To say of a Senator that he measures up to the duties and opportunities of his office in their widest field is to speak of a man who has not yet appeared in this body. To say of a Senator that he has devoted good abilities, with conscientious fidelity and industry, to these high duties, and has achieved a creditable success, is a eulogy which a king might well desire to earn.

This, and more can truthfully be said of Senator MCMILLAN.

There was, in addition to his civic virtues and the many excellent contributions he has made to the success of the Government, a charm of elegant refinement in his deportment as a Senator, and a genial warmth of good will toward all his associates, that have left for him a place in the esteem of the Senate which will always be cherished by those who shared in his labors.

It is a happy augury for the higher and purer civilizations that seem to have followed the sun, through many ages, in its visitations to equatorial regions, and to have prospered under its nurture, that the vandal races have lost their power to oppress the world, and their ancient haunts and breeding grounds are becoming centers of light and nurseries of the highest morals and of the noblest sentiments. It is a still happier circumstance that the Western Hemisphere has never been the nursery of such invading hordes of Northmen.

English and French pioneers occupied the vast region between the frozen sea and the lake region on our northern border, and changed the haunts of savage races to the dwelling places of civilized and Christian peoples. That grand and fertile region that is under the scepter of the British Empire is a leading contributor to the wealth and civilization that are distinctively American and have their center in this Republic.

Many of the excellent natives of the Dominion have been drawn to this center by its marvelous progress toward the zenith of human endeavor, while few have left us to find better government or greater social or industrial advantages or happier homes.

Among those who have come to the United States to find a home among our people, none have been more prosperous or more worthily honored or more justly esteemed for noble qualities than the youth, born in Ontario, who found a loved home in Michigan, honors and wealth among the generous people of the State founded by the grand Democrat, Lewis Cass, and a place in the Senate of the United States that was made illustrious by that great American Senator.

This was the happy result of our open doors and open hearts, that invite the nations of the world to share with us the blessings of free, constitutional, republican government, and to compete with us in every honorable work for the good of mankind.

I have not known that Senator MCMILLAN, in his Senatorial career, was tempted by that mad partisan zeal or was exposed to those consuming fires of personal ambition or covetousness that sometimes burn and rage in the furnace of trial in this Chamber. If he was, he triumphed over these enemies of American honor and celebrated his victory by presenting, in his conduct, a true example of an incorruptible and faithful American Senator.

In no act or utterance of his has the escutcheon of this great Republic been darkened with any shadow or wrong or impropriety; but his noble and gentle bearing gave universal credit to his sincere and courageous loyalty to his convictions and to his adopted country, and made his proud and statuesque form the admiration of the Senate.

Michigan opened her hospitable doors to welcome the foreign-born youth from Ontario, and again, with bowed head and reverential sorrow, she has opened her bosom to receive his honored ashes, borne to her by tender hands from the Senate of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, Carlyle, reviewing Lockhart's Life of Walter Scott, after discussing the question whether he had achieved greatness and was to be compared with such authors as Shakespeare, Milton, and others, summed up his estimate of Scott in the following words:

> It can be said of him, when he departed he took a man's life along with him. No sounder piece of British manhood was put together in that eighteenth-century time.

Following Carlyle's conception, I think I can with truth say of Senator MCMILLAN, "When he departed he took a man's life along with him," and was as complete a piece of American manhood as our times have produced.

I can think of no greater praise, no juster tribute than this; for, after all, what is real greatness and true success except the development of those qualities which we summarize and emphasize in that one word, manhood. It touches every sweet and attractive, as well as noble feature in the life of a man. It is a word difficult, perhaps impossible of definition; and yet it is something which we recognize and appreciate without definition. It signifies all that a man ought to be in this world, and it signifies more than that, the one possession which a man can carry out of this world into the next, a possession which is to constitute the foundation of a new career in a new life under new conditions. It is a possession which inspires respect, admiration, love, in enduring form. It signifies character, and all that character implies; so when I say in this brief tribute to my associate and friend that it was his genuine, rounded manhood which inspired my respect and affection, I have said all that I can say, either to express my deep sense of loss or my estimate of the man.

Others have spoken of his Senatorial life and service, of his ability, of his integrity, of his industry, of his keen perception and sagacity, of his purposeful convictions, of his unlimited knowledge of public affairs, of the trust which was reposed in him, of the service rendered by him not only to his constituents, but to the whole country. All this that has been said of him is true, the language already used is but the language of justice, but it could not be true or just if it were not for the eminent degree in which he possessed not only these qualities, but all those other human qualities which go to make up that thing which we call manhood.

What an example and inspiration is such a life. Men if they are worthy the name strive with all their might for success. According to the different standards of life which men may adopt, they desire to be distinguished and conspicuous. One may seek fame, another may aspire to power, one may desire great wealth, another to explore the realms of science, one to be considered an orator, and another a genius, a philanthropist, or a statesman; to such men there comes the ambition so to live that it may be said when they are gone that they were conspicuous examples of success according to their idea of what constituted success in life; but I know no epitaph which can be placed on a tombstone which so fully expresses and emphasizes my ideal of a successful career as this: "He was eminent in his manhood."

Senator MCMILLAN was my associate here in the Senate for more than thirteen years. There was a phrase in more common use a few years ago than at present which spoke of a man as living in "the keen, bright sunlight of publicity." Senator MCMILLAN lived here, as always, in that sunlight. Indeed, all men honored by their constituents with a seat in the Senate must perforce live in that sunlight. Their action, their motive, their life is not in secret; it is in public. We come to know and appreciate our associates and our comrades for what they really are. They find their duties and their work prescribed for them here by the estimate placed upon them by their associates. Judged by this estimate, Senator MCMILLAN was one of the most respected, most trusted, and honored members of the Senate.

The interests of a great people like ours are wide and varied, vast and important. They touch the very heart and core of national life and national development.

Problems which confront us daily affect human happiness and human development as nowhere else in the world. To care for such interests, to solve such problems, requires not only a great fund of knowledge and information, but the soundest judgment in complicated affairs.

I pass by the work of Senator MCMILLAN as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The interests of a great capital city are, by our laws, placed in the keeping of that committee. So well was that work performed that its conclusions as reported to us by its chairman were scarcely ever questioned. The city of Washington has no mayor, it has no legislature, but the chairman of the District Committee combines in himself the functions of both the mayor and common council and performs the work which in other cities is performed by that official and that body. It was no light labor; it was wearisome and ever unappreciated, but it was an important work nobly performed.

I pass by his service on this committee to speak of the fact that the great and important interests of the nation are considered nowhere in larger measure than in the three great committees, Appropriations, Commerce, and Naval Affairs, upon all of which our comrade served with honor and distinction, in all of which his conclusions were most influential, in all of which he rendered great service to our great country. Senator MCMILLAN never sought committee assignments; he cared little or nothing for what is sometimes called rank in committee service. He was placed on the committees which I have named solely because of the estimation in which he was held by his comrades. They felt that his service was needed there; that these qualities of which I spoke in the beginning, which go to make up manhood, were not only needed, but imperatively needed, in a man who should serve on these great committees. We know of the service performed there; we know, as the public can not know, of the benefits arising to the whole nation from such service.

A Senator primarily represents his State and its interests in this body, but in a larger and wider sense he represents a nation and its interests. He must, therefore, be broad rather than provincial. He must see not only the immediate supposed interests of the one State whose representative he is, but his eye must explore and take in the interests of all States and of all the people in all the States. Much as Senator MCMILLAN was honored by the people of his own State, full as was the confidence which his constituents reposed in him, he was more highly hon ored by us as a representative of the nation, and the confidence which we gave him, large and in full measure, was as a Senator of the United States.

He was not an orator; he was not a genius; he laid no claim to brilliancy; but he was in the best sense a man who accomplished things, and whose every act tended to the enrichment of his fellow-men, and especially of the people whose true interests were never absent from his thought and purpose. We miss him, we mourn him; it seems as if his place with us could never be fully occupied by others, but in his absence we respect and admire and love him as we did when we enjoyed the delight of his presence and comradeship.

There is after all, when a man lives such a life as JAMES MCMILLAN lived, some consolation to those who survive and mourn him, and not the least, indeed, the greatest, of the consolation which I feel is that I may truly say of him, "When he departed he took a man's life along with him."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, so much has been said, and so well said, by the Senators who have gone before, that I shall content myself with a brief personal tribute to him whom we so unaffectedly mourn to-day.

Senator MCMILLAN had led a most active life, in which almost everything he touched turned to success. In the great business which he managed and in his outside ventures and investments his wisdom and sagacity carried him past all the perils that beset the business world, and at the time of his death he had accumulated a great fortune, the beginning of which almost entirely depended upon his constant and resolute activities. I think he owed very little to accident or blind fortune.

In this struggle he distanced almost all competitors, and, Mr. President, it can be said truly of that great fortune that not many men ever made such a trust so largely for the benefit of others. In every place where the late Senator was well known the list of his benefactions is a long one. They were silent and unobtrusive, but they ranged through a very great realm. He lifted up the downtrodden; he relieved the distress of the poor; he imparted life and spirit to every form of enterprise that came to his notice. He was one of the men who made two blades of grass grow where one had grown before.

And when later in life he launched his bark on the rough sea of political life, the same qualities that had insured success in business—honesty, activity, ambition, with the bedrock of integrity and hard work—carried him almost at once to the leadership of his party in the great State which he so well represented here for so long a time.

In this body these same qualities brought him to the front. They were conspicuous here, and illuminated his pathway as they had in other walks of life. At the time of his death he was upon some of the greatest and most important committees of this body. There he always made himself felt, and, though not a frequent talker, he was always listened to with attention, and the measures of which he had charge were almost always passed by by an approving Senate.

I suppose, Mr. President, I may say that in the Committees of Appropriations, Naval Affairs, Commerce, and the District of Columbia it will be very hard for the Senate to fill his place. These great committees cover a very wide range of action and of service. The distribution of the revenues of the Republic, all the wide interests that are associated with our great commerce, the maintenance and expansion of the Navy, and the care which the nation gives to the District of Columbia, present to the mind, when stated, a wide field for the services of a Senator and a statesman.

Out of all this, Mr. President, this life of activity and ambition, Senator MCMILLAN brought a nature of exceeding gentleness and sweetness. I do not think in twenty years of service in this body I have ever known a Senator for whom all his associates had so great an affection. To some of us who knew him very well the void that was made by his death will never be closed. The love that we had for him can not well be expressed. His generosity, his thoughtfulness, his wide charity for the faults and failings of others, his abounding hospitality, all made of his life a sweet song, the notes of which are still vibrating.

I can add nothing to the sincere and touching words of the Senator from Iowa as to the beauty of his domestic life, where he was always at his best.

We shall go our ways, Mr. President, without him; but, looking at that vacant chair, I feel that the Senate Chamber will never be just what it was when he was with us. I am sure, Mr. President, that the world was better for our dear lost friend having lived in it.

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana. Mr. President, it was a true and trite saying of the ancient Romans that nothing should be said of the dead but that which was good; but it has been also said, with equal wisdom, that we owe nothing to the dead but the truth. While we should refrain from unjust criticism and censure of those who are no longer here to defend and protect their memories from attack, we should similarly avoid that fulsome flattery and high-sounding eulogy which serves only to detract from the true measure of one whose life has passed into history. Above and beyond all, it should be the paramount duty and the office of those who seek to perpetuate the just memory of the dead to draw the moral from a good and great man's history, his acts and services, which tends to elevate humanity and benefit his surviving countrymen and make the world better for his having lived on earth.

With these guiding principles in view, I venture in a brief way to join in these memorial exercises of the distinguished dead. Coming as I do from a State bordering on the "summer sea," almost the extreme Southern boundary of our country, and the deceased Senator from the Peninsular State, almost at the extreme northern boundary, differing as I did and do from him in many of the political principles in the administration of our Government, I feel that in what I say I can not be justly charged with undue bias, when I seek to pay an humble but no less sincere tribute to his memory.

To my mind, at least, the most useful and impressive lesson of his life lies in the forceful example which it affords to the youth of our common country as a stimulus and incentive to honorable aspiration and successful effort, however lowly and humble may be their origin and the condition of their environment. It is from the contemplation of such lives as that of the late Senator that our posterity should learn the great lesson that in a country such as ours the avenues to a competency, yea, even to great wealth, as well as to the highest honors of the Republic, are ever open to the industrious, honest, and ambitious of our young men, however modest may be their stations in life.

Springing from sturdy Scotch stock, and inheriting from his Gaelic ancestry those traits of industry, frugality, economy, and perseverance which have marked the careers of so many of our most successful leaders in the fields of finance and statesmanship who came from kindred parentage; born in Canada of parents whose limited means confined and restrained his early education to such training as the ordinary common school of that day usually afforded, we find young McMILLAN at the early age of 14 years earning a scant livelihood at the nominal wage of a clerk behind the counter of a hardware store in Hamilton, at a period when that now prosperous city of the Dominion was little more than a straggling and sparsely settled country village.

At the end of these four years of his novitiate in commercial business, hopefully ambitious, confident, and self-reliant in the ability that was in him, boldly aspiring to a wider field for the development of his business talent, he then emigrated to Detroit, there to make his future home in his adopted State of Michigan, and before he reached his majority in his new residence he had won his way to trusted and responsible employment in the fulfilling of large and important railroad contracts.

Progressing ever upward and onward, amassing little by little, by dint of unflagging industry and rigid economy, a limited capital, and then associating himself with other young men similarly circumstanced, he embarked in the establishment and carrying on of car-building enterprises, which at first conducted on a small scale gradually extended in a larger measure to other car works and various other financial enterprises in half a dozen or more growing railway centers. The successful conduct of these undertakings was largely attributable to his business sagacity and administrative ability, and his indefatigable attention to the details of operation and management of a trade which employed 2,500 persons, and gave an average of from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 in receipts and expenditures per annum.

Thus, by close attention and industry, when he had barely reached middle age, at a time when most men have only begun to accumulate a competency, he had attained great wealth, his fortune at the time of his death being estimated at $15,000,000, although during the greater part of the last twenty years of his life he had practically retired from active business operations. With this great wealth he provided liberally and generously for his family by affording them every advantage, comfort, and luxury, giving to his children the opportunity of finished educations and starting his sons on their business careers.

Mindful of the great disadvantages under which he had begun life, especially for the want of a college or university training, his public donations were lavishly distributed to educational, religious, and benevolent institutions, which amounted in the aggregate to hundreds of thousands of dollars. Those who knew him best and most intimately assure us that these public gifts were equaled by his private charities, for he was one of those who "do good by stealth and blush to find it fame."

Such was his private life; a devoted husband and affectionate father, a public-spirited citizen and benevolent philanthropist. His public life is an open book, and the distinguished services to his adopted country rendered by him while a member of this body are so much better known to the older Senators, longer members of this body than myself, as to render it useless for me to descant in detail upon their importance and value.

His close attention to duty, his untiring industry, and his practical wisdom made him a prominent leader in this Senate. With no pretense to oratory, with no especial claim to prominence as a debater, he so handled measures of large importance with such skill and ability as to carry them to a successful fruition. While his advocacy of a measure was seldom, if ever, marked by fervid eloquence or studied rhetoric, it was always characterized by a thorough mastery of the subject in all its details, and a lucid, forceful, and convincing presentation of his views.

He was what may be termed a safe, wise, and conservative legislator, meeting all public questions with a calm equipoise of judgment, and bringing to their solution a ripened experience and the mature consideration of a thorough student. Especially as a member of the Commerce Committee, over which he often presided, since the senior Senator from Maine became President pro tempore of this body, did he display a wonderful grasp of the many details of legislation intrusted to it and a just appreciation of the interests of the entire country.

He listened attentively and patiently to the demands of the different portions of the Union when the great river and harbor bills were under consideration, and weighed with equal justice their different claims for recognition at the hands of the Government. By his great knowledge of the intricacies of the subject he was enabled to reconcile conflicting differences and do substantial justice to the interests in charge of his committee. As a member of other important committees of this body he rendered conspicuous service and impressed himself upon the legislation of the country.

I believe that all the Senators will bear witness to his affability and courtesy in social converse and in public matters, both in the Senate and the committee room, and especially those of us who are younger and newer members of this body.

Easy of access, cordial in manner, obliging in disposition, it has been a pleasure to be drawn into social and public contact with the deceased Senator. For myself, I cheerfully acknowledge my indebtedness to him in this regard on many occasions. Meeting him for the first time on my entrance into this body, I have since been thrown in intimate association with him on the Committee of the District of Columbia affairs, of which he had been for many years, and continued up to his death to be, chairman, and as such rendered preeminent service, both to the whole country and the District.

Much of the most important legislation affecting the District of Columbia and the city of Washington originated with him, and much which he did not originate owes its adoption and fruition to his energetic and successful advocacy of the same. The system of just local taxation for the District, to increase the revenue with as little hardship to the taxpayer as possible, and the liberal Congressional appropriations for the improvement of the District and city were in large part the result of months of study and labor by Senator McMILLAN and his efforts in securing their adoption. Prominent among the numerous important District measures which owe their origin or adoption to him was that of the creation of a commission for the improvement and betterment of the capital city and the Park Commission. These distinguished services so endeared the dead Senator to the citizens of the District and the city that they often called him affectionately the mayor of Washington.

So great was their sense of bereavement at the loss of their best friend that the residents of this city met in mass meeting at the time of his death to express their grief and mourning, and it was there resolved to erect, by private subscription, a memorial to the memory of their benefactor to perpetuate their grateful acknowledgment of his great services. Whether such a memorial shall ever be erected or not, it will matter not. The great beauties and embellishments of this city are his best mementos.

In the heart of the great city of London, on the site where tradition tells there once stood the Temple of Diana under the Roman domination, there rises the classic pile of the great St. Paul's Cathedral. Its splendid architecture, with its white columns and pilasters, its towering turrets, its magnificent dome, and general ensemble typify the renaissance of classic art in Britain and is the admiration of all England and the rest of the world. Within its massive walls lie some of the greatest of the Empire's dead.

As the light of day streams through the highly wrought windows and stained glass it falls with its mellowed and softened radiance on the sculptured tombs of England's greatest captain, the Iron Duke, the conqueror of the great Napoleon, and on that of her most celebrated admiral, the victor of Aboukir and the Nile, and on the sepulchers of a host of heroes and of her most illustrious dead in art, science, literature, and statesmanship, all adorned with Latin inscriptions attesting the illustrious service of England's sons.

As the visitor, rapt in admiration of the splendors of the vast edifice, his soul filled with a world of historic memories and the artistic glories of the cathedrial and mausoleum, turns his steps to one of the minor entrances his eye falls upon a small, plain, and unadorned tablet, upon which is carved a simple inscription, "Sir Christopher Wren, Si monumentum requiris circumspice"—the single tribute to the great master architect, whose transcendent genius planned this majestic temple of the living God.

So the founders of Michigan, the adopted State of him to whose memory we this day pay honored tribute, emblazoned upon the shield and coat of arms of the Commonwealth, borrowing Wren's inscription, the legend "Si quaeris peninsulam amoenam circumspice." So can it well be said should any visitor to the national capital, viewing this grand city, admiring its broad and well-kept avenues, its beautiful parks, its majestic buildings, its numerous statues of great soldiers, sailors, and statesmen, its monuments of bronze and marble, and the thousand other ornaments and embellishments of Washington, the magnificent, pause to inquire where is the monument to him who more than all others contributed the larger part to these scenes of beauty and splendor.

The answer would be, look around you, it confronts you on every side. Such will ever be the reminders of McMILLAN, one of the greatest contributors to the improvement and amelioration of the capital city. Such was Senator McMILLAN, the great patron of the District, the enterprising business man, the courteous gentleman, the patriotic statesman, the poor Canadian boy who arose from poverty to well-nigh the highest honor to which a foreign-born citizen may aspire in this Republic.

Passing the milestone which marks the three-score in life's journey, he had entered the lustrum of more advanced age when death met him at the portal of eternity. With a life record of usefulness, in the full fruition of successful endeavor, like the ripened grain of the field, he bowed his head to the sickle of the Grim Reaper to be harvested in the great granary of the hereafter, "with the garnered good of the years."

How grand and proud must have been the retrospect of his latter days. He lived to see his adopted city rising from a population of barely more than a score of thousands when he first set foot upon its streets to more than a dozen fold. What, more than forty years before his citizenship, had been a frontier post had blossomed into a great and beautiful metropolis, unsurpassed in its adornment and public utilities by any city on the continent.

He had witnessed his adopted State grow great in wealth, power, and influence, and strong in the civic virtues of her people until to-day she takes her proud stand in the front rank of the States of the Union, while a magnificent domain, exhaustless in its resources, splendid in its civilization, and superb in its patriotism was established amidst the mountains and the prairies of the great West.

He had seen this Government convulsed by the earthquake shock of civil war, reunited into an indestructible Union, and all sections of our country knit together in ties of fraternal love, and the Republic proudly assuming the position of a world power among the foremost nations of the earth.

Such are but a few of the glories that illumined the life of the dead statesman, and to the proud achievement and attainment of many of which he had contributed in no small way. While his great public and private services were confined to no section, it was to the great and growing West that the best part of his life work mainly and largely enured. It was to such prowess as that of McMILLAN that it owes much of its present proud station, and it is to men like him that it must look to for its continued and increasing growth and prosperity.

To the young men of the West, as well as to those of this whole country, the shining example of his life can be held up as a model for worthy emulation. God grant that it may serve to deeply impress their character as social factors; to stimulate their patriotism; to dignify their citizenship, and elevate their civic virtues, to the end that the great Republic may move to a still higher plane of prosperity, freedom, and good government—an exemplar for all time to the nations of the earth.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it was my good fortune to have known Mr. McMILLAN well through all the years of his Senatorial service, and my regard, admiration, and affection for him increased with each successive day of our association. He was essentially a man of affairs, and in a material age, an era of wonderful commercial and industrial development, he was a preeminently successful business man; yet his spirit and nature must have come down to him from some ancestral knight of the romantic age. He was always gentle, chivalrous, and genial. He was admirable in every relation of life, domestic, social and official. The loyalty of his friendship was never disputed. The wisdom of his advice in the councils of his party was always acknowledged.

The statement of his valuable services to State and country, to which you have listened, constitutes a record which must be a never-ceasing source of pride to his friends and an inspiration to those who are to follow him. In that intimate companionship which forms the principal charm of our life here the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator McMILLAN can never be filled; even the grateful and fragrant memories of the past can not break the force of the ever-present consciousness of irreparable loss.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, but for my great admiration and affection for Senator McMILLAN I would not say one word on this sad occasion.

Only a few weeks ago we were called upon to pay tribute to the memory of a colleague—an honored soldier and statesman. To-day this Senate is again in session to speak words of sorrow on account of the death of another distinguished man, a member of this body, who suddenly passed away during the recess of Congress last summer.

Senator JAMES McMILLAN died, as has been stated, on the 10th day of August, at his summer home by the sea.

Mr. President, but one sentiment pervades this Senate; it is one of grief on account of his death.

In all my experience, and my years are not few, I never knew a man of more splendid qualities of mind and heart. He was a marked specimen of a man in appearance. He looked the noble man that he was. His demeanor was faultless, and he drew men to him, both great and small, by his quiet, yet attractive manner and by his perfect poise and sound judgment. He was a just and generous man. He had, under all circumstances, the courage of his convictions. He made few speeches, but he possessed great power and influence in his State and in the Senate. His colleagues knew his devotion to duty and to the truth. They knew his capacity to discern the right of any question, and usually they were ready to follow him in the disposition of any matter which he had investigated. He was a splendid legislator, and exhibited conspicuous ability and sagacity in the direction and management of any subject in his charge.

He was a model committeeman, and members of committees were always pleased to have Senator McMILLAN placed on a committee with them, not only on account of his capacity, but on account of his agreeable manner of association with his colleagues.

For some years before his death he was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. He was the best chairman of that committee I ever knew. He was a thorough business man, and knew well the needs of the capital city. To the District of Columbia, especially, Senator McMILLAN'S death was a great loss. His desire was to do right by the people of this District, and to build up the capital of the nation and make it the pride and glory of this country.

Mr. President, to do justice in all things and by all was a dominating feature of Senator McMILLAN'S character. Webster once said that justice is the great interest of man on earth and, quoting him further, he said:

> It is the ligament which holds civilized beings and civilized nations together. Wherever her temple stands, and so long as it is duly honored, there is a foundation for social security and general happiness and the improvement and progress of our race.

Senator McMILLAN was a Christian man and whether engaged in the whirl of business, in the struggle of politics, or in the sacred precincts of the family circle, he was the same dignified, even-tempered, Christian gentleman.

His nature abhorred anything low or deceitful. He was high-minded and generous by nature, and in his dealings with men in his employ he never had difficulty in settling questions of wages or amount of work performed.

I was present on the sad occasion of the funeral of Senator McMILLAN in his home city, where he was known and loved by all. I found that there were many expressions of great grief over his death, not only among the higher and polite classes of the community, but among the men in his employ. They loved him because they had tried him and because they had found him to be always just and generous in his dealings with them.

Mr. McMILLAN as a legislator was careful and conservative. He was a man of peace, both for himself, for his State, and for his country. He believed in conservative action by our Government in its relations and dealings with other nations. He was a wise man in the management of his own affairs, and was a sagacious counselor in determining the safe and wise policy in national affairs.

Mr. President, while our colleague has gone to that bourne whence no traveler returns, and we shall have his presence in these halls no more, we can with pleasure and profit remember his example, his constant devotion to duty, and his deliberate and wise judgment on all important questions involving the interest of the people or the honor of the nation.

Events like these, which produce in our hearts a feeling of common loss, remind us also of our own responsibilities as representatives of the people in the discharge of public duty; and as we cherish the memory of the good and great men who have been with us here may we struggle the harder to come up to the high standard of patriotism and duty made necessary by the exigencies of our times.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, what I may say concerning our friend and colleague, Hon. JAMES McMILLAN, whose untimely death we mourn, can not add to his richly deserved good name and fame. Mere words are inadequate to make more patent or enduring what he accomplished for humanity, for his friends, his State, and his country. But my heart responds to the memory of friendly association with him, in this Chamber and on committee, and the tribute I offer is the sincere testimonial of one who always felt honored in being counted among his friends.

I recall, and will never forget, the generous welcome he extended me when I first became a member of this body, and the charming kindness and courtesy that characterized his every action in our daily intercourse; and particularly do I remember how cheerfully and heartily he came to me with his powerful influence in my efforts for the reclamation of our arid West. Efforts along this line were among my first upon entering this body, more than ten years ago. Opposition and indifference met me upon almost every hand, and in all the Congress of the United States there was scarcely a half-score pronounced friends of irrigation. To the first one of my appeals for the cause in the Committee on Commerce, Senator McMILLAN was a close listener. After I had finished, he came to me and said: "WARREN, you have a good case; it is a great cause. Keep your heart in the work, and you will win. Count me with you."

His experienced and progressive business mind evidently traveled faster than my words and expressed ideas, for he foresaw not only immediate necessity for redeeming the waste places, but final accomplishment as well; and so in every stage of our Western effort to obtain irrigation legislation from that time to ultimate success the vote and influence of JAMES McMILLAN were with us.

Senator McMILLAN was still in the prime of life when the fatal summons came which took him from us. In his personal appearance he was the very ideal of good form in figure, in attire, and carriage, and he seemed truly matchless in his magnetic power of making and retaining friends. He was 64 years of age, having been born in 1838, at Hamilton, Ontario. He was of sturdy Scotch descent, his father, William McMillan, being a man of exceptionally strong and symmetrical character and of the highest integrity, whose business connections were wide and whose identification with many important enterprises made his name well known throughout Ontario.

The son, JAMES McMILLAN, was given an education essentially adapted for a successful business life. He left school at the age of 14 and entered a retail mercantile establishment at Hamilton, where he spent four years in learning the details of the business; and in this humble capacity he laid the foundation for the distinguished business success which was to follow. Then he removed to Detroit and accepted employment in a wholesale hardware store. At the end of two years' service he was appointed to the position of purchasing agent of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railway. His faithful, conscientious performance of duty attracted the attention of an extensive railroad contractor, and he was employed by him as manager in connection with the execution of a large contract. He was but 20 years of age, but he proved equal to the responsibilities placed upon him. In 1864 he associated himself with friends in the Michigan Car Company, and from that time until his death his business life was synonymous with the commercial growth and prosperity of the city of Detroit and the State of Michigan.

Strong sense and clear foresight were his characteristics, and these, added to the careful business training, which enabled an easy acquirement of all details, essential or trivial and no matter how complicated, made him master of every situation in which he found himself. A commanding executive ability, wonderful power of concentration upon any given subject, ability to keep in mind the whole field of his immense interests without losing sight of a single important link in their best and most profitable relation, serve in a measure to explain the great results he obtained.

And it was these qualifications, making of him as they did the most successful business man of his State, which fitted him so conspicuously for the important place he took in the Senate of the United States when the citizens of his State called upon him to enter political life and placed and kept him in the highest political position he could attain under the Constitution of our country.

That call was made in January, 1889, when, in a remarkable caucus of the Republican members of the State legislature—an open caucus attended by prominent citizens from all parts of the State—he was selected without an opposing vote as the choice of his party for the office of Senator in the Congress of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1889. The call was voluntary and spontaneous, for he had never sought political preferment, but he was none the less the idol of the citizens of his State.

The accumulations of his industry, enterprise, and business sagacity had not been idly hoarded. They had been turned into the channels of commerce and were benefiting thousands of his fellow-citizens. With sincere and earnest patriotism he had aided his State and his country by liberal donations when help was needed during the throes of civil war. He had increased his deeds of charity and his acts of good to his fellow-men as his increasing prosperity broadened his capacity for such deeds. Churches, schools, hospitals owned him as their benefactor, and no worthy charity found him an unheeding listener to its plea. He was the epitome of an earnest, useful, high-minded citizen, and his State honored itself and ornamented this body when it chose him as its representative here.

At the close of Senator McMILLAN'S first term in the Senate the people of his State with one voice called for his return to the Senate. The legislature by unanimous vote reelected him. The State legislature at that time contained but one member who was not of the Republican party, and he, in casting his vote with the Republicans for Mr. McMILLAN, said: "I vote for him because of his sound business principles, and as an earnest of Michigan's gratitude to a man who has served her interests so ably and so well."

He was again reelected in 1901, and it was at the threshold of his third term of service that the relentless and cruel stroke of death came so suddenly upon him.

Mr. President, when such a well-rounded character, equipped with all the grace and vigor of mind and body which go to make up the perfect man, apparently in the full flower of his strength and usefulness, is taken away from us, we pause in awe, and our weak, finite minds wonder at the inscrutable mysteries of Providence, and vainly strive to comprehend why such a calamity should fall upon us.

And it is in our feeble gropings and fruitless efforts to solve these mysteries that we realize the pessimism of that poem of despair wherein is thus presented the problem:

> Think, in this batter'd caravanserai,
> Whose portals are alternate day and night,
> How Sultan after Sultan with his pomp
> Abode his destined hour, and went his way.

And this thought would overcome us and hold us unreconciled to the fatal law which summons the best and wisest from the scenes of their earthly activities, were it not that, as we contemplate the wondrous gifts of mind, the charm of manner, the manliness of character, the high and lofty sentiment of such as JAMES McMILLAN, we must come to the irresistible conclusion that this life on earth can not be all, but that so noble a spirit—

> Shall flourish in immortal youth,
> Unhurt amidst the war of elements,
> The wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds.

Nay, more; it is when we contemplate a character of such perfection that we become confident in the belief that in some manner, at some time, and in some place, although we know not how or when or where, all will be made right by that Divine Providence at whose call all must attend.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a loving husband, a devoted father, a loyal friend passed from time to eternity when JAMES McMILLAN died. He is missed not only by those in his own household, but by his business associates, his colleagues in the Senate, the people of his city and his State, as well as by the citizens of the District of Columbia, for whom he labored long and faithfully. The life of this man illustrates the possibilities that our country affords for those who by energy, integrity, and good business judgment seek advancement. From humble beginnings he became one of the leading citizens of his State and one of the most influential members of the Senate of the United States.

For nearly ten years it was my privilege to serve with Senator McMILLAN on the Committee on the District of Columbia, and for a shorter time on the Committees of Commerce and Naval Affairs, hence my opportunities to know the man were exceptionally good, and when the news of his sudden death reached me I was shocked and pained beyond expression. In all the years of our intercourse I had never thought of him as a sick man, but on the contrary as one who would remain in the Senate for many years to come, and whose continued association and friendship I regarded as one of the chief privileges of my public life. But death came suddenly, and as I stood beside his grave, literally buried in flowers, I recalled Stoddard's poem, entitled "The Flight of the Arrow," which so beautifully tells the story of human life and human death.

The life of man
Is an arrow's flight,
Out of darkness
Into light,
And out of light
Into darkness again;
Perhaps to pleasure,
Perhaps to pain!

There must be something,
Above or below,
Something unseen,
A mighty Bow,
A hand that tires not,
A sleepless Eye
That sees the arrows
Fly, and fly;
One who knows
Why we live—and die.

Senator MCMILLAN did much for his State as a member of the Committee on Commerce, the interests of the Great Lakes being his constant care. On other committees he rendered important service, but his great work was on the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which committee he was chairman for many years, and it is in this connection that I shall more particularly speak.

When Mr. MCMILLAN entered the Senate, at the special session, in the spring of 1889, it so happened that he was assigned to a place on the Committee on the District of Columbia. Senator Ingalls was then chairman of that committee. Although inexperienced in legislative work, Mr. MCMILLAN was entirely familiar with civic problems. He had been a member of the board of estimates of the city of Detroit; had been engaged in street-railway building and operation, and had introduced the telephone into that city when the instrument was still a toy. He was familiar with all matters pertaining to railway terminals, for he had been one of a company of citizens who had associated themselves for the purpose of creating a set of railway terminals in Detroit to provide for the entrance of new railways and thus promote the commercial development of the city. In his successful business career he had become accustomed to dealing with large amounts of money in such a way as to produce large results; and thus he brought to the service of the District of Columbia an unusually varied experience. Moreover, he made it a rule to have no business interests in the District, and to make no investments here beyond the purchase of his own residence. This principle was adopted simply for the sake of allowing him to feel perfectly free to deal with each subject according to its merits and without the slightest personal bias.

Among the bills first referred to him by Chairman Ingalls was one relating to the terminals of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, in which the issue involved was the legalization of certain sidings built by the company to facilitate its own business and that of merchants owning property along its lines, the courts having declared that the right to grant the use of the streets for such purposes was in Congress and not in the local government of Washington. Incidentally the occupation of the Mall and of certain reservations was involved, and the subject had been before Congress for a number of years without action. Mr. MCMILLAN looked at the matter from the standpoint of the commercial development of Washington, and treated the problem according to what he conceived to be the practical way of dealing with it. After a very careful study of the situation on his part and after repeated hearings he was able to carry through the Senate a bill giving to the railroad company the right to purchase and use for freight purposes a sufficient amount of land to relieve the congested freight situation, and at the same time the sidings built into railroad and private yards were legalized. During the Fifty-first Congress the bill passed the House also and became a law.

The opening of the Fifty-second Congress witnessed a reorganization of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Mr. Ingalls, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. Farwell, who were the ranking members of that committee in the Fifty-first Congress, did not return to the Senate, leaving the chairmanship to be filled by Senator MCMILLAN, whose only Republican associate remaining was Mr. Higgins, of Delaware. On the Democratic side, however, there were Senator Harris, whose services on the committee began in the Forty-fifth Congress, and who was chairman of the committee in the Forty-sixth Congress; Mr. Vance, of North Carolina, who had served on the committee for twelve years; Mr. Faulkner, of West Virginia, whose service began with the Fiftieth Congress. The new members were Mr. Wolcott, of Colorado; Mr. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire; Mr. HANSBROUGH, of North Dakota; Mr. Perkins, of Kansas; Mr. Gibson, of Maryland, and Mr. Barbour, of Virginia, who died before the end of the Congress, and who was succeeded by Mr. Hunton, of Virginia.

During the Fifty-second Congress an unusually large number of laws of importance to the District of Columbia were passed, the record showing that 10 per cent of the public acts of that Congress were reported from the District Committee, a proportion which has been maintained to the present time. Among these laws were acts to regulate the building of houses on alleys; for opening and straightening of alleys; for an inspector of plumbing; to insure the safety of theaters and other public buildings; to provide a permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia outside the cities of Washington and Georgetown; to regulate the liquor traffic; to make Saturday afternoon a bank holiday; to regulate the practice of dentistry; to prevent cruelty to children and to animals; to create a board of children's guardians, and to prevent the sale and carrying of dangerous weapons. The whole number of bills and joint resolutions referred to the committee was 248. Of this number, 125 were reported favorably, of which 63 became laws, 59 were reported adversely, and no action was taken on 64.

Mr. MCMILLAN found that in the District of Columbia it had been a practice to secure charters for street railroads and in some cases to build the roads and operate them but for a short time for the purpose of selling adjacent real estate, or else to sell the charters to nonresidents. In vigorous fashion the committee took up the matter, bringing a number of roads to terms through threatened forfeiture of their charters, but in the majority of cases adopting the principle, which was ever afterwards adhered to, of extending existing roads rather than chartering new ones, thus providing, as far as possible, for the carriage of passengers at a single fare. The result of this policy was in the end a consolidation of the various roads into two strong companies, which to-day probably give the most satisfactory service at the lowest rate anywhere in the United States.

A political change having come over the Senate in the Fifty-third Congress, Mr. Harris, of Tennessee, became the chairman of the committee, but the strong personal friendship existing between the two men, and the fact that political lines were never drawn in the District Committee, did not materially decrease Mr. MCMILLAN'S activities. It was during this Congress that influences were brought to bear to establish the overhead trolley as the motive power for street railways within the city of Washington. This project met the quiet, unflinching, determined opposition of Mr. MCMILLAN, and the syndicate proposing it finally disposed of their railway properties in the District of Columbia and expended their activities on other fields. The question of rapid transit in the city of Washington, however, was a serious one. The Capital Traction Company and the Columbia Railroad Company had exchanged horse power for the cable and had installed perhaps the finest cable system in the United States.

The cable, however, was not feasible on the Metropolitan line, because of the multitude of curves, and there was a prevalent feeling that in some way electricity was the coming motive power for street railways. The storage battery was tried by the Metropolitan and the Eckington lines with persistence, but without success. Mr. MCMILLAN, who had witnessed the successful operation of the underground trolley in Budapest, insisted that this system was the one best adapted to the needs of Washington. In the end this idea prevailed, and so successful has been the operation of the underground trolley in Washington that when the opportunity occurred the roads using the cable were changed into underground electric roads, and now all roads within the limits of the city of Washington, and the cars of all suburban roads on entering the city, receive current by means of a conduit instead of by the overhead wires, which disfigure the streets of almost every American city.

Growing out of his service on the District Committee came an assignment as chairman of the joint select committee of the two Houses to investigate the charities of the District of Columbia. The joint committee was made up of three members of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia and three members of the House Committee on Appropriations. The testimony taken was voluminous, and the result was a substantial reorganization of the charity system of the District along these well-defined lines, based upon a report made by experts employed by the committee (Dr. Hurd, superintendent of Johns Hopkins University Hospital, and Dr. Chapin, superintendent of the Philadelphia Hospital for the Insane): First, the organization of a board of charities, appointed by the President of the United States, to have the general supervision of the charitable institutions of the District of Columbia, with the power of investigation; second, the setting apart of certain well-established hospitals in the District to take care of acute cases for suitable compensation, and the construction of a municipal hospital for the care of chronic cases; third, the abolition of the system of making grants of lump sums to sectarian charities. Some of these projects, such as the municipal hospital, although well begun, are still waiting completion. On the whole the change has been of immense advantage to the District.

Besides the municipal hospital Mr. McMILLAN took an active interest in securing the Girls' Reform School, the location of the Carnegie Free Public Library on the site it now occupies, and the erection of an adequate building for the Business High School, an institution to train the youth of the District for commercial life.

Another project which had the untiring support of Mr. McMILLAN is the filtration of the Potomac water, and here again his established principle of calling in experts for advice on all important projects was resorted to. On January 4, 1901, under Mr. McMILLAN's direction, a hearing was held in New York, which was attended by the officers in charge of the Washington Aqueduct, the health officer of the District of Columbia, and all the leading filtration experts in the United States. As the outcome of this hearing a commission of three experts was appointed to report upon the proper system of filtration for the city of Washington, and when that commission recommended a slow sand filtration system, with auxiliary works for preliminary sedimentation and the use of a coagulant for a part of the time, the views of the commission were enacted into law, and the work is now in progress.

Mr. McMILLAN also urged the completion of the Lydecker tunnel for increasing the water supply of Washington, and insisted on large appropriations for the completion of the sewer system at the earliest practicable moment. During his chairmanship, and with his keen sympathy, an investigation was made by a subcommittee of the District Committee into the school system of the District of Columbia, which investigation resulted in a reorganization of the school board and changes in the curriculum along the lines of more practical instruction in the graded schools. As the result of another investigation, also conducted with his cooperation by a subcommittee of which he was a member, a fourth year was added to the high-school course.

In 1901, as the culmination of ten years of investigation, adjustment of conflicting interests, and steady pressure upon the steam railroads, laws were enacted to provide for abolishing grade crossings along the lines of the steam railways in the city of Washington, with a further provision that hereafter no new grade crossings should be established within the District of Columbia.

The celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the removal of the seat of government to the District of Columbia was carried out by a joint committee of the two Houses acting in cooperation with the citizens' committee of the District. Mr. McMILLAN, as a member of the Senate committee, brought in the report of a committee of five recommending, among other things, the enlargement of the Executive Mansion in harmony with its present style of architecture, and the construction of an avenue to be known as "Centennial avenue," running from the Capitol through the Mall to the Potomac River, substantially in accordance with the original L'Enfant plan for the city of Washington.

Subsequently plans for the improvement of the Mall and for the enlargement of the White House were reported to Congress, but neither of these plans met with popular favor, and at Mr. McMILLAN's instance the Senate provided for a commission of experts to take up the whole question of the development of the park system of the District of Columbia, the work to be done under the general direction of the Senate Committee on the District. A subcommittee, consisting of Messrs. McMILLAN, GALLINGER, and MARTIN, was appointed, and after consultation with the American Institute of Architects, Mr. Daniel H. Burnham, of Chicago, the director of works of the World's Columbian Exposition; Mr. Charles F. McKim, of the architectural firm of McKim, Mead & White, of New York; Mr. Augustus St. Gaudens, the well-known sculptor, and Mr. Frederick Law Olmstead, jr., one of the consulting landscape architects of the metropolitan park commission of Boston, were selected as such experts. This commission made a careful study of the District's park system, both as to the development of the outlying parks and their connections, and also with reference to the placing of public buildings hereafter to be erected.

In order to carry out the scheme proposed it was necessary to modify the grade-crossing laws so recently enacted and to secure the removal of railway tracks from the Mall. This led to a reopening of the legislation affecting grade crossings, with a view to realize for the city of Washington the dream of half a century, namely, a union railroad station located on private property to be purchased by the railroads themselves. At the end of another series of negotiations, in which the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company heartily cooperated, with a view of making the capital city what it should be in point of beauty, suitable legislation was passed in both Houses of Congress and is now in conference.

The essential feature of the plan for the future development of the District of Columbia calls for no unusual expenditure, but merely provides that as the wants of the Government increase in the way of buildings, parks, and parkways, such development shall proceed in an effective, orderly manner, instead of at haphazard. Although the work of the commission was reported to Congress scarcely a year ago, no fewer than 12 items embraced in that report have received favorable consideration, and the continued adherence to the general plan would seem to be assured.

Thus hastily and imperfectly I have outlined a few of the changes that were brought about during the years that Senator McMILLAN was chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. It would be too much to claim for him, and he would have been the last to claim for himself the entire credit for these improvements. He always sought the cooperation and support of the members of the committee, and to those members who were charged particularly with one project or another he gave the benefit of his advice and his persistent energy. So long as results were accomplished he cared little about taking credit to himself. There was so much to be done that no sooner was one project fairly under way than he took up another, so that he was always living in the future so far as Washington was concerned. Although one of the busiest of men, it was so natural for him to systematize his work that he was always accessible in the committee room to citizens of the District who wished to consult him upon any business connected with the committee. Propositions coming from the Commissioners, from citizens' associations, or from individuals, if they seemed to him proper and expedient, were taken up and pushed forward without reference to their origin or authorship. He did not belong to that class of reformers who are more anxious to tear down than to build up, but as public sentiment dictated and as opportunity offered he carried out those projects which were necessary for sound municipal housekeeping.

And, after all has been said, the matter resolves itself into this: He was a useful legislator in the development and improvement of the nation's capital, in whose future he firmly believed and to whose interests he was devoutly attached.

Mr. President, when the magnificent union railroad station has been constructed, when a broad vista has been opened from the Capitol to the Monument, when the Mall is rescued from its unsightly condition, and the south side of Pennsylvania avenue is redeemed from its present environments and occupied by costly public buildings—when these things shall come to pass, as they are sure to do, then will be erected in the nation's capital a more enduring monument to Senator McMILLAN than could possibly be produced from granite, marble, or bronze. In the years to come, whatever others may have done or shall do along the lines that he marked out, credit will be given to him as the one man in public life who clearly foresaw the greater Washington, and who gave freely of time and energy to the accomplishment of the grand purpose he had in view. And so to-day, paying tribute to his memory, we not only recognize him as associate, friend, and Christian gentleman, but proclaim him the benefactor of the nation's capital, the wise and loyal friend of the nation's welfare. As one who knew and loved him, I to-day place on his grave a fresh flower of affection, a token of tender and loving memories.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, for more than ten years Senator McMILLAN filled a large place not only in this body, but in the public life of the United States. He engaged the affection of all who knew him and commanded the respect and confidence of thousands who had never looked upon his face or listened to the sound of his voice. He was a power in the Senate, a power in the councils of his party, a trusted adviser of Presidents, a doer of deeds who left his mark on legislation and upon the political events of the time. These are high titles to distinction, and as we commemorate his services to-day it seems most fitting that we should inquire how it came to pass that he won and wore them so well. He certainly did not obtain the power and honor, the respect and confidence, the opportunities of public service which he used to such good purpose by chance nor, with equal truth it may be said, in the beaten way of politics.

When he spoke on this floor all that he said was full of light and sense, and rested solidly on thorough information. But he spoke seldom, and still more rarely entered into debate. He sought no share in the heavy work of national campaign management, had no taste for the part of a Warwick, never strove to be conspicuous in the bustle and confusion of a great national convention. Outside his own State his reputation was made, his power was gained, his place among the chief public men of our time was won here in the Senate. Won, too, it was not merely without any resort to intrigues and devices for self-advancement, but without the usual and natural aids to distinction which come from activity in debate or from eloquence in speeches which strike the public ear and arrest the popular imagination. To attain to reputation, to power, and to place among the leaders of public life, above all to reach results of great practical moment to the public welfare under such conditions implies the possession of qualities of a high and somewhat unusual order.

It is of these qualities that I wish briefly to speak. First, Mr. MCMILLAN was a man of character. In other words, he was honest, courageous, loyal to what he believed and strong in his belief. He was, as a matter of course, an able man. No one could have accomplished what he achieved both in public and in private life unless he had possessed both ability and force in a marked degree. But he had in addition other and less obvious qualities which went strongly toward the making of his success, upon which we ought to dwell, because they are more likely to be overlooked than those which met the eyes of all men at the first glance.

Mr. MCMILLAN came to the Senate with a high and deserved reputation as a business man, and this reputation reached far beyond the borders of his own State. He had developed and built up a great industry in Michigan; he had become a leader in many large enterprises; and in all his undertakings he had shown skill, foresight, and capacity to a remarkable degree. The results of his labors had not only brought wealth to himself, but had largely aided the prosperity of the State and city. In a word, Mr. MCMILLAN, when he entered the Senate, was and always continued to be a fine example of the highest type of the successful American business man. That type commands in this country, and justly commands, unstinted respect and confidence. The ability of the United States has very largely gone into business—into trade, commerce, transportation, industry, and manufactures—because the development of the country was the work nearest and most imperative, the opportunity for success in life was there most ample, and because our instinct as a people told us that the widest and most splendid future for the nation was to be reached through the gateway of material expansion.

The bold spirit which a century ago inspired our merchants to send forth their vessels to plow everywhere with daring keels the waters of the globe has been characteristic of our business men in all the new fields which have opened before them upon this continent since that day. As once, confiding in crew and vessel, they drove their ships in safety under a press of canvas which made the seamen of other nations stand aghast, with the same coolness and courage they faced the enormous risks of new enterprises on land, and met failure not only with constancy, but with renewed hopes and with unfailing fertility of resource. With the finer spirits among them we find also from the beginning that behind the honest desire for gain and riches there was always present the belief that they were laboring for their country as well as for themselves, and whether they won or lost they had faith that they were doing the nation's work as well as their own. They did not forget when they sent a cargo in the early times across treacherous seas to distant ports that the flag went with it, and in these later days when they have opened mines, built railroads into wildernesses, planted factories, and created industries, the thought that they were also toiling at the upbuilding of the United States was never lost.

Among men and minds of this high type Mr. MCMILLAN was conspicuous, and he dealt with the results of his success in the same spirit. He never forgot the responsibilities of wealth. To all that might advance knowledge, to libraries and schools, to all that might relieve suffering he gave openly and freely, while at the same time he never rested from that gentler giving which reaches the individual man and woman, but which with him ever preserved that secrecy in which the left hand knows not what the right hand doeth.

A large success in business won by his own qualities of mind and character, a spotless reputation, a wise generosity in the uses of wealth, a high public spirit, these were all his, all known to be his when he came to the Senate. But there was something else, there was yet another quality without which all these achievements, all these honored and honorable gifts and possessions would have failed to win for him place and power, influence and distinction in the great field of public service. This quality was a fine sanity of mind, that clear perception of the true relation of a man's self to the universe, so often unconsidered, so little valued, and yet so vital to influence and to the accomplishment of deeds worth doing. And this clear good sense, this undisturbed vision which saw the conditions of life as they really existed belonged in full measure to Mr. MCMILLAN. He never for a single moment made the error, he never for a moment was capable of making the error, of supposing that because he had been a brilliantly successful man in private business he was able from that fact and that fact alone to deal at once with public affairs better than anyone else no matter how well trained or for how long a time.

Our just admiration as a people for success in business and for the ability and power shown by our business men upon the largest possible scale leads often to the thoughtless cry that if we could only have more business men in politics who would manage public affairs as we manage private business all would be well. The presence of business men in politics can not be too earnestly desired, and we have far too few of them. But the theory that public business must be conducted like private business is dangerous because it is impossible, and it is impossible for the simple reason that public business is not private but exists under public conditions.

The corollary of the proposition about managing public business as one would manage private business is that the successful businsse man must be able at once to conduct public affairs because he has succeeded in widely different occupations entirely private and largely or wholly his own. We have all seen many examples of distinguished business men who have come into public life with loud acclaim and who, acting on the theory that success in private business made needless all further information for the conduct of public business, have passed out of public life quiet and unremarked, wondering very much why they had failed. The reason really is not far to seek. They failed in public life because they had omitted that qualification which they would have said was the primary condition of their private success—because, in a word, they had not taken the trouble to learn their new business. They had been unable to understand that the conduct of public business requires education, training, knowledge—in short, that it must be learned like any other trade, profession, or calling.

Mr. MCMILLAN'S clear, strong sense and firm grasp of realities made any such delusive error impossible to him. He set himself to learn the conduct of public affairs and the merits of public questions as he had addressed himself to all other problems and tasks in life. In this frame of mind all his previous training, all his experience, all his knowledge of men and affairs became a powerful aid instead of a hindrance which checked him or a screen which shut out a just perception of the new tasks before him and the new conditions around him.

In this way he became master both of the task and the conditions. Thus he rose to be a sound and far-seeing legislator, a trusted counselor, and a sagacious adviser, as moderate as he was wise in judgment both of men and measure. Indeed his mastery of his subject and his surroundings grew to be so complete that although with an undue modesty he shrank from debate and from speechmaking, he was thoroughly able to manage a contested bill and steer it through all the besetting dangers to the haven of enactment, a feat appreciated in this Chamber, but involving an amount of skill, temper, and ability little understood outside the Capitol. In his own special field he became an absolute authority, and he may fairly be said to have governed this District for many years. With large views he looked far into the future, and that future will count JAMES MCMILLAN as among the chief benefactors of the nation's capital city.

But behind his ability and his industry so thoroughly shown in his work here and in its results was a fine character and a nature at once strong and gentle. There were no secrets in his life, no hidden record which he feared would leap to life. Under the kindly manner, the genial good nature, and the sympathetic humor was rigid honesty in act and purpose, high-minded devotion to duty, and unbending patriotism. Modest and quiet always, he was nevertheless ever firm and courageous.

Such were his many fine qualities, such his abilities, such his service and his distinction as a public man who was an honor to our public life. But there was yet another side, not that of the public servant, or the able Senator immersed in toil and strife and anxiety, but that of the man. He was a good friend, loyal, generous, and helpful. Once admitted to his friendship, no one would willingly have lost it. He was too reserved to practice any of the arts of popularity, but few men were more beloved than he; fewer still of such marked ability and decided character were so entirely free from exciting animosities. It might always be said of him that he "Still in his right hand carried gentle peace to silence envious tongues."

We here make record of his public services, here to-day bear testimony to his high place in the public life of our time and to his many public virtues. All this is for those who come after us, in order that they may rightly judge. But for ourselves—for us who knew him—the public utterance which speaks to the world the sincere words of respect and praise is not the deepest feeling of our hearts. We turn there and find the simple grief, old as mankind and, alas, ever new, for a dear friend who has passed out of our lives and who had the unconscious power, better than much art and many abilities, of winning and holding, not only the love of those nearest him, but the unswerving affection of all with whom he strove and labored, or sorrowed and rejoiced, in the daily round of life.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, it is always with regret that we view the retirement of any member of this body after the long association which has given rise to friendship and created ties which are never to be forgotten. But when that separation is caused by the hand of death, our loss is viewed with the deeper feelings of sadness and of sorrow. During the past year such loss has come to us through the death of JAMES MCMILLAN. There is no member of the Senate, in which he occupied so high a position, who does not realize that he has not only lost a most able coadjutor and faithful friend, but that the country has also lost one whose efforts were always to promote its best interests. The motives governing men in public life are always the objects of strictest scrutiny, and the probe of constant criticism is sure to reveal any lack of honesty or sincerity. In the many years of his public life JAMES MCMILLAN was never found lacking in these respects. Not only his immediate constituents, but the people of the United States put full trust in him, and that trust was never betrayed. And none knew this better than those who were his colleagues here, and who exercised their own privilege of criticism from the vantage ground of intimate acquaintance and knowledge of his acts as a Senator.

The ability of Senator MCMILLAN as a public man is equally well established. It was recognized by the people of Michigan long before they sent him to represent them in the United States Senate, but it was in this body that he found his opportunity, and his labors here revealed the power he possessed to work under the inspiration of those high ideals as to duty which governed all his acts. In consequence he showed himself to be a statesman whose view of affairs was not restricted by local conditions, but embraced the broad field of national well being. In the truest sense he was a Senator of the United States. The good of his country was the aim of all his efforts, and to those efforts are in no small measure due the blessings of that prosperity in which all our people now share.

I had the pleasure and honor of serving with Senator MCMILLAN on three important committees—Appropriations, Commerce, and Naval Affairs—and it was through their meetings that I came to know him well as a Senator and as a friend. The questions before these committees are often of the greatest importance to our Government, requiring, for right solution, wide knowledge, sound judgment, absolute sincerity, strict honesty, and broadness of view. In whatever respect the acts of these committees may have fallen short of securing universal acceptance, little of that failure can be attributed to him whose loss we deeply deplore. To every problem he applied that careful study which gave to his opinions a weight and value that were freely acknowledged, and his influence was exerted for the right, for the best good, and for the honor of our country.

Few people, probably, realize that the real work of legislation is performed in the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives. It is there that the twenty thousand or more bills which are presented to each Congress are examined, those which are bad, impracticable, or objectionable set aside, and those which have merit fully discussed, and, if deemed in the public interest, placed in the way to receive the sanction of the Senate and the House. The amount of labor which is involved in the consideration of these twenty thousand and more bills is very great, but Senator MCMILLAN, though sorely burdened, never ceased his tireless work upon those that came before him. The examination into the needs of the different Departments of the Government, that the appropriations therefor may be adequate but not extravagant, is a work in which much time and investigation are spent, and spent profitably to the people by such men as my late colleague, who countenanced no expenditure which, as a business man, he would not allow were it a question of an enterprise of his own. In the matter of commerce and the improvement of rivers and harbors, he was as painstaking and as thorough as though his own commercial interests were at stake. In naval matters, the defensive needs of the country were his first consideration, and he gave his approval to all measures that tended to secure a greater measure of safety for our country.

Besides his arduous duties on these committees he was for many years chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is its virtual governing body. What has been accomplished by him in what may be called his administration of its affairs is well summed up in a comment made more than once that Washington is the best governed city in the United States. The pride taken by him in the capital finds expression in the comprehensive plans for its improvement and beautification recently perfected. Should those plans be carried out, the name of JAMES MCMILLAN will thereafter be inseparably connected with the most beautiful capital in the world.

Though the voice of JAMES MCMILLAN will be silent forevermore, yet will he live to all those who knew him well, for the good which is in all honest men is not interred with them, but continues to exert its influence after they are gone. No one who came into intimate contact with our colleague while among us can ever, I think, escape the influence of that upright character. His life as a public and a private man will ever serve as an incentive to bring to bear in public and private business that industry, sincerity, honesty, and loyalty which made him what he was—a man receiving and deserving the respect and gratitude of the people of the United States. No better standard for public men can be found than that which he has established, and in his death the body of which he was such an honored member has lost one of those great characters which do so much to keep at its high level the Senate of the United States. But he will never again move among us. His voice is forever silent. His life is blended with the mysterious tide which bears upon its current nations, empires, and peoples into the great ocean of eternity.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the number of feeling and eloquent tributes that have been paid to our dead friend indicates only too clearly the high esteem and honor in which we all held him. There is no need for anything more to be said than has already been said, but I would do myself an injustice and do my own feelings a wrong were I to remain silent on this occasion and not have something, however brief and unstudied, to say about the dead Senator whom we are all endeavoring to honor. I am unwilling to have his chaplet made up without contributing at least one flower.

During the eight years of our service here together—he was my senior by some years—I have closely watched him, as well as all my other colleagues, and I have come to have some ideas about the Senate and Senators that are perhaps not shared by others. I know that while in this Chamber there is something more or less like a mask which we wear because of the publicity which is given to our utterances and our acts, it is in the committee rooms, where there is nothing of that, that we learn to know each other, to know each other thoroughly, and to judge with as keen an analysis and power of reaching at the true inwardness of character as the royal acids go into material things.

It was in the committee room that I first learned to know and to value this man, and it was there that I had evidence of his respect and friendship, which I came to value as it deserved. There was a simplicity, a geniality, a self-poise about him that very few men whom I have met here possess. Kindly, quiet, gentle, there was still that firmness which indicated that he had absolute faith in his own purposes and absolute confidence in his own judgment. It is in the light rather of the man than of the Senator that I shall remember him, and shall always be glad to have known so fine a character. Remembering the rugged health which he apparently possessed, for he was never complaining, and his constant attendance upon this body in its sessions, and his tireless work in the committees, if we had been called on when we adjourned last July to pick out from among our number a man who would be called away during the interim between the sessions—if we had voted by guesswork as to who should die next—I doubt if Mr. MCMILLAN would have received a solitary vote. In the suddenness of his death and the shock it produced we are reminded of the uncertainty of life and the tragedy in which we ourselves may soon be an actor.

It was only a brief while after we left here when the telegrams came announcing his sudden and sad death. This reminds us, Senators, that in our acrimonious discussions of public matters and in our narrow partisanship and bitterness, and all that kind of thing, the associations in this Chamber ought to teach us greater charity to one another. We do not know who comes next. We can not tell before whose door the angel of death shall next appear to deliver his dread summons. We do not know how soon the next one of us shall go hence.

In thinking about this man who has gone I can hardly realize that he is dead. I am reminded constantly that he may be just staying away, like others have done, from some cause. But the ceremony we are going through, the repeated and earnest and honest and feeling tributes which we have paid to him, only go to show that there will never be a morning when we shall meet him again. Those beautiful words of Lamb, addressed to a young girl who had just died, come to my mind in this connection:

> My sprightly neighbor gone before,
> To that unknown and silent shore,
> Shall we not meet as heretofore,
> Some summer morning?

We shall never see him again here, but we all know that we are hastening to greet him elsewhere. Let us all strive to live such lives that we can have said of us after we die, and said truly, one-thousandth part of what has been said here to-day in behalf of this man's sterling worth, his genial, happy, open-hearted, kindly nature, and be able to claim even a tenth or a twentieth or a hundredth part of the respect and love which he has won here so unostentatiously and modestly.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, a graphic picture of sympathetic grief is that portrayed in the Holy Book in the scene where, when utter desolation had overtaken him whose name is the synonym of affliction, the mourners, with mantles rent and with dust sprinkled on their heads, sat beside him in silence. Human emotion in all the ages has been the same, and now, as in that farther past, speech, if not altogether vain, is all insufficient in the presence of the great mystery.

And yet, sir, we can not put our dead away in silence. The bereaved heart must speak its pain, and friendship can not forbear to pay its tribute of love and sympathy.

Mr. President, I have but a word to say, and that word I would not neglect this opportunity to utter.

An eminent Republican statesman is reported to have said upon the occasion of the death of a Democratic colleague, that among the sweetest fruits gathered in political life are those which hang over the party wall. Beautiful is the simile in which the thought is expressed, and to its truth there will be found a ready assent by all political opponents who recall the sweet association they have enjoyed in this Chamber with Senator MCMILLAN.

In the Senate, as the years pass by, many come and go and some for a time remain. Among them, in the course of years, many types are found, and his type was of the best of them. It may be properly said that his was a rare type—rare in its excellence and rare in its peculiarities. In his make-up there were some marked contrasts, and yet while thus marked they were pleasing contrasts. While he was essentially a conservative man, he was a political partisan in so far that he was devoted to the tenets of his party and unswerving in the loyalty of his support to its measures; nevertheless no man was more broadly catholic than he in the toleration of differences in political opinion.

No one was than he more deferential to the opinions and considerate of the feelings of those between whom and himself those differences existed. No one was more pronounced in opposition to the measures of the opponents of his party; but no Republican Senator than he has ever counted more personal friends upon this side of the Chamber.

The many courtesies extended by majority Senators to those of the minority daily attest the kindliness and the cordiality of the personal relations which happily exist here, in spite of the heat sometimes evolved in the shock of earnest debate. In the front rank of Senators thus distinguished by these courtesies stood Senator MCMILLAN. And thus it was that in his daily intercourse, official and personal, with his political opponents in the Senate, there grew only ever-increasing cordiality and good will.

He was not a speechmaker; but, charged as he was with duties and responsibilities relating to the gravest and weightiest matters of the Government, as to matters the responsibility for which peculiarly devolved upon him, there was no Senator whose views and opinions were better known or more influential in the Senate.

In his bearing and demeanor there was an unvarying dignity, but austerity there was none. On the contrary, his never-failing courtesy, his unaffected and ready smile, his cordial grasp of the hand, the manly tone of his unreserved frankness, all come back to us as an ever-pleasant and ever-abiding memory.

He was no idler. His unflagging industry was in the work hours ever busy in gathering and storing up the information and in working out the great problems of the vast measures with which the Senate has to deal—problems which are dealt with by the great Committees on the District of Columbia, on Naval Affairs, on Commerce, on Appropriations, and on the Relations with Cuba; but when the labor was put aside, no devotee of fashion enjoyed more unfeignedly than he social pleasures and the delights of the bounteous hospitality which he generously dispensed.

With large business interests which necessarily invited his personal attention, with a fondness for outdoor sports which daily tempted him to the woods and the fields, he was, nevertheless, ever attentive to his official duties, and rarely did it happen while the Senate was in session that he was not to be found either in this Chamber or in his committee room.

Mr. President, the story of his life is a grateful task properly belonging to others. Upon this occasion mine is the simple office to say some things at this time of his personal relations with ourselves, which I am sure will be cordially concurred in by all Senators on this side of the Chamber—those not of his party faith and affiliation; and above that to testify by the fact of my participation in these exercises to my esteem and admiration and the personal love I bore him.

Sir, those of us who recall his manly form as he went in and out among us, dignified, quiet, composed, and with the kindled eye of steady purpose, can realize how he died as he had lived, and how, unwasted by disease, with physical vigor unchanged, with mental faculties unimpaired, calmly and serenely he went to his final sleep like one who "lies down to pleasant dreams."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, the ceremony in which we are engaged to-day is time-honored and beautiful. It is most fitting that we should pause in the transaction of the nation's important business and pay tribute to the memory of one of the nation's departed servants, to place upon the permanent records of the Government the measure of our esteem for his life and work.

During my comparatively brief service in this body the grim reaper has gathered a rich harvest from among the membership of the Senate of the United States. He has respected neither person nor place; he has pursued his insatiable quest and has struck often where we least expected.

I have listened with great interest to the eloquent and just tributes which have fallen from the lips of many able Senators in honor of the memory of JAMES MCMILLAN, late a Senator from the State of Michigan. I might well be silent. I can not, however, refrain from adding my brief and sincere token of esteem and affection, for Senator MCMILLAN was my friend, and this is the last kindly earthly office which friend can perform for friend.

We recall to-day the life and achievements of no ordinary man. Senator MCMILLAN attained high rank and long held a position of distinct and commanding influence in his State and the nation, and we may well contemplate the qualities which gave him place and power and which made him "troops of friends." All that remains to us is the precious memory of the generous elements within him and of the many good deeds he wrought in both private and public life.

He was a man of marked force of character and of unusual power. For many years he wielded great influence in this exalted body, and why? Those who knew him best need no answer. He was not an orator; he spoke but seldom, and only when occasion imperatively demanded, and then in the briefest possible way. His eyes were never fixed upon the galleries. There was never present in what he did any suggestion of a thought of mere personal aggrandizement. He coveted the rich jewel, modesty, and seemed to care first of all for the approval of his own conscience. He sought to win the confidence of men, without which all enduring efforts are vain, and having gained it he never abused it.

He was a man of uncommon good judgment. He possessed that homely and invaluable quality called common sense, and reached the central truth of great and important questions with an almost unerring instinct.

He brought to the Senate large experience in the vast affairs of the business world, a sphere in which he performed a conspicuous part. He had long dealt with important and difficult problems. He had cultivated the executive faculty, and well understood how to dispatch business of magnitude. He was never confused by the multitude of complex, often almost bewildering, questions pressing upon the attention of the Senate. He adopted for the consideration of the public business the same orderly method observed in the conduct of his large personal affairs.

He had confidence in the integrity of his own opinions, yet he was neither dogmatic nor offensively assertive in maintaining them. His mind was open to the appeals of truth and reason. His opinions were always coined in the mint of an honest purpose. He was a sincere man and did not indulge in indirection or dissimulation. He had no patience with sham and pretense, for he loved the genuine and the natural.

He was a man of firm and strong character. He was indifferent to nonessentials and readily yielded them, but he was strong in his adherence to the essentials. Matters of principle, of conscience, had no more inflexible supporter than he. What they commanded he faithfully did, and he could not do otherwise. He possessed that necessary quality in statesmanship, integrity of purpose. Without it there can be achieved in statecraft no honorable and enduring success. True statesmanship is not founded upon mere expediency, but upon fundamental principles of right and justice. Statesmanship of the highest order finds its predicate in a patriotic and enlightened purpose.

Who that knew him can forget the personal bearing of our friend among his associates in this Chamber? His manner was dignified, easy, and courteously deferential, quiet, and genial. His pleasant smile and warm grasp of hand were but the external expressions of the true nobility within.

Senator MCMILLAN was a philanthropist in the best sense. The way to his generous heart was open to the deserving unfortunate; he greeted the outstretched hand of need, and with sympathy heard the plaintive voice of want. He sought larger opportunities in life, not for selfish purposes, but that he might the better render service to others.

Our nation's capital has lost its wisest and most serviceable servant. He had given it years of earnest thought, systematic and careful study. He worked along broad lines, as he always did, and firmly believed that the greatest nation should have a capital fairly typical of its majesty and power. He believed that such also was the desire of the people, and in what he did toward the development of Washington into the first capital among the nations of the earth he felt that he but interpreted the wishes and purposes of his countrymen, and that he was but giving tardy effect to the far-reaching plans of George Washington.

When we parted with our colleague at the close of the last session none believed that we would not meet him again when we reassembled. His appearance gave promise of many years of usefulness to his country, of pleasant comradeship to his associates, and of sweet influence within his home, that charmed circle where abide the most sacred memories upon this earth. In all the vast lexicon of man there is no holier word than home.

In all that has transpired, we realize how short is our vision, how little the wisest among us can see beyond the hour. When the intelligence came to us that Senator McMILLAN was dead, we could scarcely believe the sad truth. When doubt was dispelled and the dread reality was forced upon us, we could well believe that he met the swift summons uncomplainingly. He so often during his eventful career had met occasion so well prepared that we can believe that he was not unprepared for this.

No stain rested upon the record of our friend. There was no act in all of his earnest life which we could wish were undone. Along the arduous path through which he passed were countless deeds of generosity, of philanthropy, of humanity. He did not live for self alone, but he lived for others.

His career was one of great usefulness and, measured by the best human standards, it was a most successful and honorable one. He loved his country, he loved his State, he loved his fellowmen. He lived for them, and he would, if need had been, have died for them.

In the month of August last, midst a wealth of flowers whose beauty and fragrance had filled his days with joy, and through streets thronged by the sorrowing multitude, we bore our friend to his final resting place. In the beautiful and tranquil "city of the dead" we laid him tenderly away and left him to his everlasting rest. Sleep well, thou generous, incorruptible, and chivalric spirit. In this last and loving office we, who labored with and trusted and loved you, say a last farewell.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, these occasions are more than mere tributes to the memory of departed brethren. They give the opportunity to recall honorable and successful lives and to point to them as examples which are valuable to the States of those who have died and to the country. There is no better representation of every phase of American life, character, and achievement than the Congress of the United States. In it are men who have forged to the front in the strenuous battle which is upon us everywhere and have so impressed their fellow-citizens as to be selected to make their laws and manage their Government. No student of the Congressional Directory, through the years of our existence as a government, can but feel inspired with hope and ambition. It is a dictionary of success mainly from the humblest beginnings. It is a record of those who have honored that much-abused phrase "self-made men."

During most of the formulative and revolutionary period of our history lawyers have commanded legislative positions. The people believed that the education and training necessary for admission to the bar and the familiarity with the laws which are requisite for the practice of the profession especially fitted lawyers to be legislators. It is only within recent years that business has become the leading profession of our country. It is business interests which are most likely to be affected favorably or otherwise by legislation. Until almost a decade ago the more active a man was in industries the less interest he took in politics. I remember a great merchant of New York who voiced the sentiments of his associates when he said that he crossed off his credit book "any customer who was in politics or aspired to or held office." For a period it was fatal to the aspirations of a young man entering upon a business career to have applied to him what was then the opprobrious name of "politician."

When a young legislator in our State legislature, I was at a meeting of those merchants and financiers who controlled the business of the metropolis. They had members of the legislature as guests in order to present to them their views upon pending legislation, which, if enacted, would have inflicted serious damage upon the city. We discovered that none of them ever voted except at Presidential elections. None of them took any part in the preliminary work which controls parties and selects their representatives. I told them then, and have been more than ever convinced since of its truth, that people who take no part in politics have no right to complain of what politicians do for them; that if they suffered, it is their just punishment for the neglect of the highest duty of citizenship. Now, however, that condition has happily changed. Business men find that if they would keep prosperity for themselves and for the country they must take an active and intelligent interest in public matters.

Senator McMILLAN was the leading business man of his State and among the foremost of its successful men of affairs. He was never satisfied with occasional voting and continually complaining and criticising, but he found time, as every man can, for a beneficent interest in local, State, and national matters. He demonstrated that the manager of a great business, without neglecting the welfare of his associates, can serve his city or his town if they require his experience or his brains, or his party as chairman of its State committee, by bringing to that organization in that capacity the faculties which have placed him at the front in the creation of enterprises and the management of affairs. Senator McMILLAN was entitled, if anybody, to that phrase with which we are becoming gradually familiar, a "captain of industry." Great as has been the progress and development of the United States, materially, financially, and industrially, fortunately public sentiment has kept pace with its growth.

A Senator of national reputation said a quarter of a century ago that there is nothing so dangerous to the public welfare as a million of dollars unless it be two. This declaration received universal applause. But we have learned to draw the line between money which is active in the creation of new industries, in enlarging the scope of old ones, in developing resources and opening new territories for settlement, and that baser and sordid use of accumulations which benefits, if it does benefit, only its selfish possessor. If a million dollars will give employment to 500 men, two million will require the services of a thousand. A billion-dollar company places upon its pay roll 125,000, and as part of its success, by concentration and reduction of cost, adds 25 per cent in wages to the 25 per cent more employed than under former conditions. The railway whose capita lenabled it to build a hundred miles gives work upon its single track and limited facilities to a mere fraction of those who are required when it extends a thousand miles, with the equipment, which both attracts increasing traffic and stimulates it.

Here we have in the career of our friend a concrete object lesson of this process of beneficial development. Coming as a very young man from Canada to Detroit, he starts in employment as every American boy does, and then as he masters the business arrives at partnership and control. The shop becomes a factory, the factory expands from the product of one article to many. The ramifications of the business extend beyond the city, through the State, and from the State all over the country. The employment runs from one to ten, from ten to a hundred, from a hundred to several thousands. At each advance there is a betterment of every condition, both for the business and for those in every capacity who are connected with it. The city soon recognizes and utilizes that faculty of organization and administration which had accomplished this result. His party demanded a service which was conspicuously performed in the leadership in Michigan in several Presidential campaigns. Then the State asked of him for the Commonwealth of Michigan this talent for its representative in the United States Senate. For thirteen years he sat here as Senator of that great State. At the time of his death he had just been returned for six years more. He was not an orator. He had not the gift of speech, but in labor and in counsel there was no more valuable member in this body. Business in its highest sense, that business which means prosperity to the country, the employment of capital and labor, activities of every kind which enlarge old avenues and open new, found in him here one of its most efficient representatives. He was for years at the head of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The capital as we have it to-day, with its parks, its avenues, its water, its public buildings, its transportation facilities, and all that makes it the finest example of an American city, owes much of its beauty, its comfort, and its development to the wise administration of Senator McMILLAN.

In all ages the question has constantly recurred, In what manner, if the choice were left to us, would we prefer to die? The prayers in most churches all over the world offer on every Sabbath day the petition to preserve us from sudden death. That is based upon the theological dogma that the sins of a lifetime can be forgiven and salvation secured by a death-bed repentance. Without desiring any controversy, I can not help believing that in the bookkeeping of heaven there is a debit and a credit account which can only be balanced by works as well as faith, by deeds as well as professions. So I count most happy those who escape the agonizing scenes, so often recurring and so painful at death, of parting with those we love. Here we have a friend who in every position in life did his duty according to his best lights as a father, a husband and a citizen, a man and a Senator. He so lived during the time allotted to him by God that when in a moment he was called to join the majority, he left behind him nothing but praise and had before him the certainty of reward.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. President, when the last leaf is turned and the book of life falls idly to the ground, we pause and think. The crowding incidents of conflict and treaty, of loyalty and indifference blend together, with the happier memories dominant.

It would be impossible for me here to give a history of the life of JAMES McMILLAN. With its main features the whole country is familiar, and it is not its details which concern us so much as its significance.

The story of his younger days is all the story of a struggle; that grim, silent struggle of a man against circumstances, wherein there is no mean between subjection and mastery—McMILLAN conquered. Step by step, steadily and wisely, he moved forward; from schoolboy to clerk, from clerk to proprietor, and thence to the control of great commercial interests. Through the valley of toil he walked strong and unwavering. Great factories in his home city and ships on our Great Lakes bear witness to the many enterprises that mark his life's achievement.

His charity is shown by hospitals, and his quiet giving the poor and needy will always hold in grateful remembrance. He prospered in the affairs of the world until that prosperity moved almost of its own weight.

His State made him a representative in this great body. Of his career here it would be presumption for me to tell you—his colleagues. The new beauties of this capital city are but examples of his creative and comprehensive mind. They are the facets of the gem which catches the light; the expression, in terms, of the beauty of a character built on effectiveness.

I could tell you of an acquaintance of more than a third of a century with this man, who was ever courteous, generous, and modest, whose courage was unyielding, and whose character was made strong by an unflinching determination. But I could tell you nothing half so eloquent as the single-hearted devotion of those and to those who lived in closest communion with him.

Memory will inscribe upon her tablets his unfaltering loyalty and love to those he held most dear. Let that be JAMES McMILLAN'S monument.

It matters little how long life is; it matters all how it is lived. He, the man, has come and gone. With him, a strong man has been in our midst, a generous one has passed away. Simply he trod the road, and simply he turned aside to rest. Let posterity pass the final judgment upon his public deeds, as it will upon ours.

Distance lends perspective, and only in perspective can objects attain a true proportion. But whatever a future generation may think or say, we, his contemporaries, write him JAMES McMILLAN, statesman, gentleman, friend, and man.

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the pending resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 31, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 30, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Clerk, Hon. ALEXANDER McDOWELL, who read the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1903.

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, as Speaker pro tempore for this day.

D. B. HENDERSON, Speaker.

Thereupon Hon. JOHN DALZELL took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RED CROSS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the report of the executive committee of the Red Cross Association.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the report of the executive committee of the Red Cross Association. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar, under the special order entered yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bills upon the Private Calendar, and agreeably to the order of yesterday the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Claims, will indicate the first bill to be read.

ELISHA A. GOODWIN.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (S. 1672) for the relief of Elisha A. Goodwin, executor of the estate of Alexander W. Goodwin.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I ask the chairman to indicate the Calendar number?

Mr. GRAFF. The Calendar number is 1947.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue duplicates to Elisha A. Goodwin, executor of the estate of Alexander W. Goodwin, late of Vanceboro, Me., in lieu of United States 4 per cent registered bonds, funded loan of 1907, acts of Congress approved July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, Nos. 71011 to 71018, inclusive, of the denomination of $100 each, amounting to $800, said bonds alleged to have been lost or stolen. Also to issue to the said Elisha A. Goodwin duplicates in lieu of United States 4 per cent coupon bonds of the funded loan of 1907, acts of Congress approved July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, Nos. 148356 and 148357 of the denomination of $1,000 each; 56961 to 56966, inclusive, of the denomination of $500 each; 66681 and 66829, 168768 to 168787, inclusive, of the denomination of $100, amounting to $7,200: Provided, That the said Elisha A. Goodwin shall first file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum equal to the amount of the missing registered bonds and the interest that would accrue thereon until the same shall become due or payable; and a bond in a penal sum equal to double the amount of the missing coupon bonds and the interest that would accrue thereon until the same shall become due or payable, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with conditions to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim on account of the said lost or stolen bonds.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the purpose of issuing duplicate bonds in lieu of those that have been lost. The bill itself has been drawn in accordance with the recommendation of the Treasury Department and the claim itself is favorably recommended by that Department. The bill is conditioned upon the claimant filing a bond, to be approved by the Treasury Department, of twice the sum involved. I move this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

FLORIDA BREWING COMPANY.

Mr. GRAFF. I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN] to indicate the bill which he will call up.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 10678) for the relief of the Florida Brewing Company, Calendar No. 1194.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and reconsider the claim of the Florida Brewing Company, of Tampa, Fla., for the refunding of $326.52, amount paid for stamps purchased from the collector of internal revenue at Jacksonville, Fla., and affixed to beer exported to Cuba during December, 1898, and January and February, 1899; and if, upon reopening and reconsidering said claim, said Commissioner shall find said stamps, or any part of the same, to have been affixed to packages of beer actually exported to Cuba, it is hereby made his duty to ascertain the amount paid for stamps so affixed and to allow the claim for such amount; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the said sum of $326.52, or so much thereof as may be found by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have been paid for stamps affixed to beer exported to Cuba.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to refund $200 of tax stamps on export beer to Cuba. No tax was required by law for export beer to Cuba, but the shippers of this beer paid stamp tax at the rate of $2 a barrel. The Internal-Revenue Department recommends the refunding of this stamp tax. The bill provides for an accounting with the Internal-Revenue Commissioner and whatever amount he finds ought to be refunded shall be refunded.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM D. RUTAN.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 903, Calendar No. 758) for the relief of William D. Rutan.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of William D. Rutan, late collector of internal revenue at Newark, N. J., with the sum of $1,350, the same being the net value of certain snuff stamps forwarded by said Rutan to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for exchange under the provisions of an act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, which stamps were lost in transit, or otherwise, and never accounted for.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a bill for the purpose of paying a late collector of internal revenue in Newark, N. J., $1,350, the net value of snuff stamps forwarded by him to the Commissioner for exchange, under the act of June 13, 1898, which were not credited. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports the stamps were returned as obsolete, and that one registered package actually received in his office could not be traced or found; that Rutan's cash and stamp accounts balanced; that the stamps were obsolete and could not be used, and that he, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, recommends the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ALEXANDER S. ROSENTHAL.

Mr. GRAFF. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] to call up a bill.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 6714, Calendar No. 1022) for the relief of Alexander S. Rosenthal.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Alexander S. Rosenthal, late consul of the United States at Leghorn, Italy, the sum of $819.11, to reimburse him for moneys expended by him in procuring the disinfection of articles of merchandise shipped from the port of Leghorn, Italy, to the United States during the prevalence of cholera in the year 1893.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the claimant was the American consul at the port of Leghorn, Italy, during the prevalence of the cholera at that port. The consul was required to ship a considerable quantity of merchandise to American ports. There was no law providing for an appropriation for the purchase of disinfectants. The consul had been appealed to by the American shippers and consignees as well as by the exporters to have the shipments promptly made. He consulted the statutes with regard to charges, and found that he was not permitted to impose any greater charges than those expressly provided for in the law. He communicated with the legation at Rome, and was there instructed to have the shipments promptly made.

For the purpose of effecting such shipments as well as for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease in this country, he very prudently indeed expended the sum of eight hundred and some odd dollars mentioned in this bill. The fact is, that this money had been so expended, and unless the consul had taken these precautions against the spread of cholera in our ports, the goods would not have reached our ports, in pursuance of the request of the shippers and of the directions given by his superior officer, and had the consul not taken these precautions the dreadful plague might have been brought into this country. There is no appropriation provided for the reimbursement of this expenditure, and for want of such appropriation relief must of course be had from Congress. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Has any of the departments examined into this matter and ascertained the facts in regard to it?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes; the Department seems to have been communicated with. There is a long communication appended to this report.

Mr. PAYNE. What Department?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The State Department.

Mr. HULL. What does the Department recommend?

Mr. PAYNE. What do they say about it?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. All the vouchers from the medical officers at Leghorn are on file in the Treasury Department.

Mr. PAYNE. What was the value of these goods?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It ran away up into hundreds of thousands.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the shippers pay that amount in the first instance?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The shippers are not required to pay, and, in fact, the statute provides that if the consul shall impose any greater charges than those provided by the statutes he shall be deemed guilty of extortion. Therefore the charge could not be imposed upon the shippers.

Mr. PAYNE. Then they did not pay it?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Of course not. Yet the consul was directed by his superior officer, the minister, to have the shipments made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], that the bill be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

FANNIE T. SAYLES.

Mr. GRAFF. I call up the bill (H. R. 15747) directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn by George A. Bartlett, disbursing clerk, in favor of Fannie T. Sayles, executrix, and others.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that George A. Bartlett, disbursing clerk, Treasury Department, did, on the 19th of July, 1902, issue a check, No. 1813553, upon the Treasurer of the United States at Washington, D. C., in favor of Fannie T. Sayles, executrix, and others, for the sum of $3,708.33, being in payment for rent of a building in Indianapolis, Ind., for quarters for Government offices; and said check was by the said Fannie T. Sayles, executrix, and others, indorsed for deposit in the Merchants' National Bank, Indianapolis, Ind., and so deposited, which check was subsequently mailed by the Merchants' National Bank to its correspondent for collection, and was destroyed in a wreck on the Pennsylvania Limited on July 24, 1902, in transmission through the United States mails; and

Whereas the provisions of the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, apply only to checks drawn for $2,500 or less: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That George A. Bartlett, disbursing clerk of the Treasury Department, be, and is hereby, instructed to issue a duplicate of said original check, under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, under existing law the disbursing clerk at the Treasury Department has no right to issue a duplicate check in excess of $2,500. The amount in this case exceeds that sum by eight or nine hundred dollars; therefore the claimants are compelled to come to Congress for relief. The bill has been drafted by the Treasury Department and recommended by it.

Mr. PAYNE. Under the general law, I believe parties receiving duplicate checks are required to give a bond. Is there such a provision in this bill?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir; the language of the bill is—under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF PETER JOHNSON.

Mr. GRAFF. I call up the bill (H. R. 6830) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the heirs of Peter Johnson certain money due him for carrying the mail.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to the heirs of Peter Johnson, deceased, the sum of $1,859.91, being balance due him for carrying the mail on route No. 8588, between Saluria and Corpus Christi, in the State of Texas, from July 1, 1858, to June 30, 1862.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

said amount being for the time reported by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, to wit, from December 31, 1860, to May 31, 1861.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this is a claim for carrying the mails prior to the war, and the amount stands now credited on the books of the Treasury Department. We have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury showing that the amount is now due on a settlement had with this party before the war. The reason the Treasury Department did not pay the amount was on account of a statute passed in 1867 forbidding any officer of the Government paying any claim or demand to any person who was not known to have been in favor of the Union and against the Confederacy. I believe, however, there was an act passed in 1877 relieving mail carriers from the operation of that statute. This amount, as I have stated, is due, according to the books of the Treasury Department, and should be paid.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman this question: Does it appear in the report or by the evidence before the committee whether this man was paid by the Confederate government for carrying the mails?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. It appears that he was not, and the Treasurer says their records do not show that he was paid.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, if he was carrying the mail of the Confederate States during the course of this time——

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No; not during the course of this time.

Mr. PAYNE. Up to 1862.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Oh, no; that is amended. The amendment was to strike out that. His contract was until 1862, but the contract was annulled on the 31st of May, 1861, by the Government, and this is for services only up to May, 1861.

Mr. PAYNE. Commencing at what time?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. From January, 1861, or 1860.

Mr. PAYNE. How much does the bill carry?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Little over $1,800. This is the amount found due in his settlement with the Government prior to the war between the States, and so appears upon the books.

Mr. PAYNE. Why is it that this claim was not paid at the time, or a portion of it?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Simply because the war broke out and there was a statute passed in 1867——

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I know, but this commenced in 1860, the forepart of 1860, as I understand. Why was not the installment paid for 1860?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Because no settlement was had with him prior to May 31, 1861, and this balance appears to his credit for services from January 1 to May 31, 1861. We have passed several bills like this. The only reason all such bills have not been paid before is on account of that statute of 1867, passed when the feeling between the two sections of the country was very bitter.

Mr. PAYNE. But here is a bill for services for a year and four months prior to the breaking out of the war.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Oh, no; from January 1 to May 31, 1861, the same year.

Mr. PAYNE. That is only three or four months.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. That is a pretty heavy mail contract.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Well, the Government made the contract with him, and this is the amount found in the settlement.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The motion was agreed to.

CLARA H. FULFORD.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I next call up the bill (S. 916, Calendar No. 1500) for the relief of Clara H. Fulford.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, instructed to redeem, in favor of Mrs. Clara H. Fulford, widow of D. Fulford, two bonds of the United States, of the denominations of $50 and $50, and known as five-twenties, said bonds having been destroyed by fire the 9th day of July, 1872, and to pay to Mrs. Clara H. Fulford, widow of said D. Fulford, the amount of said bonds, together with accrued interest from July 1, 1872, to the date of the maturity of said bonds.

SEC. 2. That the said Mrs. Clara H. Fulford, widow of D. Fulford, shall also execute and file with the Secretary of the Treasury a bond, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the penalty of $100, conditioned to save harmless the United States from loss or liability on account of said bonds or the interest accrued thereon.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB SWIGERT.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I next call up the bill (H. R. 12075, Calendar No. 1264) for the relief of Jacob Swigert, late deputy collector, seventh Kentucky district.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200 to Jacob Swigert, late deputy collector, seventh district of Kentucky, the said sum of money being payment in full to said Jacob Swigert on account of loss of 20 ten-dollar documentary stamps during the month of January, 1899.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this is for loss of $200 worth of revenue stamps which were destroyed by fire. The bill is recommended by the collector of internal revenue in Kentucky. The stamps were in the possession of the deputy collector. He had purchased these, with other stamps, for some railroad to attach to a deed. When he opened the package he found all the stamps there. He then put the package in an iron safe. When he reopened the package for delivery of stamps those special stamps, for which this claim is made, were found to be missing, and it is supposed that when first opened they dropped from the package and were swept into the fire. This is the only way to account for their loss. They were 20 ten-dollar stamps and have never been found, and of course have never been used. The Government lost nothing.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No; they do not make any recommendation at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Has there been any investigation at all, except by the deputy collector himself?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes, the collector himself——

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the collector himself, but I say by any other person.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. As I said before, the deputy collector who purchased these stamps for the railroad, when he opened them, found all the stamps were there. He put them in his vault, but when he went to get them out for the railroad he found that these ten-dollar stamps were missing. They must have dropped from the package when first opened and then swept into the fire. The deputy collector swears so.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand; but it seems nobody has investigated the facts and recommends the passage of the bill except the collector there, who is responsible for the stamps himself.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. There is no way to prove they were destroyed except by the collector himself and his deputy.

Mr. PAYNE. They could send an inspector there to take the evidence, some intelligent man.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The Government did not send an inspector there, but the collector of internal revenue examined into it, and there are affidavits which go to show that the deputy has a splendid character and has made a most diligent and faithful officer. He swears that the stamps were lost or destroyed, as explained.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Government was paid for the stamps?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes; and those stamps have never been used in that county; and I do not suppose any irresponsible party could dispose of ten-dollar stamps. They have never been found.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill, and the facts in the case are these: Mr. Swigert was the deputy collector at Frankfort, and he made a special requisition for 40 one-dollar stamps, 30 three-dollar stamps, and 20 ten-dollar stamps for a special purpose. He examined the package containing the stamps and found the contents to be correct, and, as he thought, placed them in his safe until they were needed; but a few days afterwards he went to his safe to get the package, and when he opened it the 20 ten-dollar stamps were missing.

Mr. PAYNE. What evidence did the committee have before it of the loss of these stamps?

Mr. TRIMBLE. There is no evidence except that of Mr. Swigert, which, in substance, is as follows:

That during the time he served as deputy collector aforesaid he served as stamp deputy for division 1 of the seventh district of Kentucky, under appointment from Hon. Sam. J. Roberts, collector of internal revenue for said district.

That during January, 1899, there was sent to him as said deputy collector a small white envelope, same being attached hereto and marked "A" for identification, which contained the following documentary adhesive internal-revenue stamps: Forty one-dollar stamps; 30 three-dollar stamps, and 20 ten-dollar stamps, the same being a special order and intended to be used to stamp deed transferring the Kentucky Midland Railway.

That upon the receipt of said envelope he tore same open to ascertain if it contained the stamps ordered, and after examining the contents of the envelope placed same in vault, which is located in his office, for safe-keeping until they were called for. That several days later (six or seven) upon Mr. George B. Harper, receiver of said Kentucky Midland Railway, calling for same, he went to the vault to get them for the purpose of selling them to him, and upon looking in the envelope for them found that the 20 ten-dollar stamps, which he thought he placed in the vault in the envelope along with the other stamps, were missing.

That he immediately reported said fact to the collector of internal revenue at Lexington, Ky., and made thorough search throughout his office and vault, but was unable to find said stamps.

He further states that he firmly believes that said stamps were inadvertently dropped upon the floor by him, when he was examining contents of envelope and at end of day gathered up with the waste paper and burned in office grate, as it was the universal rule to so burn scrap paper at end of day.

He further states that no stamp of the denomination of $10 has been used at the county clerk's office of Franklin County, the county in which his office is situated, since the war tax went into effect and that the smallest instrument demanding 1 ten-dollar stamp would be a $10,000 deed.

Mr. Chairman, this is a just claim. The stamps lost were of such a denomination that they could be affixed only to a $10,000 instrument. Consequently no petty thief could have stolen and used the stamps. They were never used in the county where they were bought to be used, and the 40 one-dollar stamps and the 30 three-dollar stamps were there. If they had been stolen, the smaller denominations would have been taken. Mr. Swigert had to replace the stamps. He is a poor man and not able to stand the loss. As I have said, he was an exemplary officer and a man of sterling integrity and undoubted veracity. I know him and can vouch for these facts.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that the committee ought to investigate a case like this more thoroughly. Of course the amount is small, but I hate to see a precedent like this established, by one collector coming in here, the man interested, and on his own affidavit obtaining the passage of a bill for a claim like this. It seems to me that the committee ought to have investigated further, and ought to have presented some better evidence to the committee than they are able to present in this case. I know it is a small amount, and the gentleman who introduced the bill seems to know the deputy collector, and says he is a man of the highest character. He probably would not be concerned in the larceny of $200 worth of stamps; and yet it is not a good precedent to establish, because some day some man may come in here who is not of the highest character and about whom there might be some doubt.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CAPT. E. O. FECHÉT.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (S. 679) directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn by Capt. E. O. Fechét, disbursing officer, United States Signal Service Corps, in favor of the Bishop Gutta Percha Company. This bill does not appear upon the Calendar, but it should be there. It was reported yesterday.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Capt. E. O. Fechét, disbursing officer United States Signal Corps, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the Bishop Gutta Percha Company a duplicate of an original check issued by said E. O. Fechét on the 29th day of September, 1900, No. 35321, upon the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, in favor of the Bishop Gutta Percha Company, for the sum of $2,733, which check is alleged to have been lost in transmission through the clearing house before reaching the said assistant treasurer of the United States at New York: Provided, That said duplicate check shall be issued under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks, under the provisions of section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, including an adequate bond of indemnity.

Mr. GRAFF. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN L. YOUNG.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up Calendar No. 1156.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman give the House or Senate number?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The bill is H. R. 7792, for the relief of John L. Young.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay John L. Young, of Union, S. C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,984.98, being for services rendered the United States in carrying the mails in 1860 and 1861.

The following amendment recommended by the committee was read:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out "$1,984.98" and insert "$1,471.18."

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this is another one of those antebellum claims. The amount stated in the bill was found due upon the settlement with the Treasury Department before the war, and it appears to the credit of claimant upon the books, for services rendered as mail carrier before the war. The Government has received the services, the amount is due, and the committee thought and still think it ought to be paid.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the gentleman about this bill. I took occasion to look up the other one, but I do not know about this. The facts in the case of the other bill, so far as the report was concerned, were that the committee did not have any evidence about it at all. Now, in this case did the committee have any evidence of the contract?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The statement of the Postmaster-General sets out the contract and shows that the amount was due.

Mr. BURKETT. To the same extent that he did in the other cases that we passed a moment ago?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BURKETT. To any greater extent?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. To no greater extent.

Mr. BURKETT. What is the evidence as to this man having been paid?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The records of the Department show no payment and the amount is still due, as appears from the books of the Department. Of course the record here would show if he had been paid by this Government.

Mr. BURKETT. What investigation has the committee made to ascertain whether these claims have been paid?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The committee had the affidavit of this man that he had not been paid.

Mr. GRAFF. We always require that affidavits shall be filed of that character.

Mr. BURKETT. In the other case the committee did not have any affidavits, as I understand it; at least the report did not say so.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not remember about the other case, but it is the rule generally in these cases that we require affidavits of the claimants, for the reason that the records of the post-office with regard to the payment of cases of this class by the Confederate government are incomplete. They have some of the Confederate records there. They can not answer with definite certainty about payments by the Confederate government; and therefore all they can do is to examine the partial Confederate records in their possession to see that there is no evidence from this partial record that it has been paid. So we supplement this by asking the affidavit of the claimant that he had not been paid by the Confederate government or anybody else.

Mr. BURKETT. Why were not the amounts paid by the Government?

Mr. GRAFF. The reason for that was, these claims originated at a time when the gentleman and I were very small. But the records show to us that hostilities commenced, and orders of the Post-Office Department were issued in various parts of the Southern States; as hostilities developed and parts of the country came under Confederate authority, then these contracts were canceled and thereafter the man ceased to be in the employ of the United States Government, and United States mail was not being carried in that section. Then, of course, the war followed, and there was no opportunity for these people to collect the small balance due them.

Mr. BURKETT. In this other case that I have been looking up I find the man ceased carrying the mail on May 31, 1861.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. BURKETT. He had been paid up to the 31st of December, 1860, and he claims for the time from December 31, 1860, to May 31, when the Confederate government took hold of the matter. Now, I find that notwithstanding that fact he never filed a claim until 1883, as I read the report.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I do not know that this claim was filed before. It could not have been filed before 1883, because there was a statute forbidding those claims. It could not have been paid for in 1867. The statutes then forbid the payment of any of these claims.

Mr. BURKETT. I understand the statute of 1867, but it did not prevent them coming to Congress in the meantime.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. You know, and we all know, that as early as 1883 the feeling between the two sections, the feeling that had been engendered during the late war had not died away so much as to enable them to get a bill of this kind through Congress, and that is the reason.

Mr. BURKETT. What I was trying to get it is this: It is not a question as to these two cases, but if we pass cases of this sort here it is going to open up cases of this kind from all over that country.

Now, the question that I want to get at is, if the committee has gone into the question and examined these claims. It is not these two cases alone that I am thinking of.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that this is an honest claim, and whether it opens up a lot of claims that does not matter. If the claim is honest the Government ought to pay it, and the Government has been paying them all the time, so that I hope the gentleman will not pursue this matter any further.

Mr. BURKETT. The question that I am trying to get at is whether the committee investigates the claim. Here is a claim, which is brought especially to our attention very recently, of this sort where it has not.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. You are mistaken.

Mr. BURKETT. I am trying to find out whether the committee ever investigates the claim. So far as the report is concerned there is no evidence of an investigation. In this case the gentleman said he did not know whether an investigation had been made or how much of an investigation before the committee had been made.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The gentleman who introduced the bill [Mr. JOHNSON] came before the committee. He knew the man, and had investigated the facts thoroughly, and he stated to the committee that it had not been paid. There are several bills of this kind presented and several bills have been before this House of this nature in which payment has been allowed. When the member representing them comes before our committee and it appears that the Government of the United States has had the service and it has not been paid, we feel like we ought to allow these bills.

Mr. BURKETT. There is no question about that. I am not contesting that. I am trying to find whether there is any evidence to show whether the payment has been made or not. I can not find that there was any evidence.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I take it if the gentleman should come before the committee and make a statement of the facts to the committee the committee would gladly take it.

Mr. BURKETT. But I would not ask the committee to take a statement of facts on a matter like that of which I knew nothing personally.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, it seems now from the discussion of the gentleman from Nebraska that this is one of those claims——

Mr. GRAFF. I have just been informed that the claimant died last Friday, and if that is true the bill ought to be amended. Amend in line 4, after the word——

Mr. PAYNE. I do not seem to be able to maintain the floor. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems that this claimant ought to have been paid by the Confederate Government. We never heard any complaint that they did not do this, especially during the early years of the war. I never heard any complaints but that they did pay this class of claims. The presumption is they paid this claim as the man went on carrying the mail, and of course trusted the Confederate Government for the payment of it. But there is no evidence that it has not been paid so far as the committee have presented it to this House. I know the gentleman from North Carolina said that the member of the House who introduced the bill said it had not been paid. Of course, he did not know of his own knowledge that it had not been paid; he was not there with the contractor to see all that had been paid him during the forty years so that he could say it never has been paid; so there is no evidence before the House, as there was none before the committee, that the claim has not been paid. They come here with the presumption that this claim has already been paid and all there is to overcome that presumption is the statement of the judgment, or opinion, of the gentleman who introduced the bill that the claim has not been paid.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we ought not to be called upon to pay claims of this character, over forty years old, without some evidence of some kind, somewhere, that the claim has not been paid. I do not know how many of these claims are before the committee, but I do know that if we go into this business of paying claims without requiring evidence sufficient to overcome the presumption that the Confederate Government did pay them, we shall have a good many of them.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the committee did state that Mr. Jackson filed an affidavit with the claimant that he had not received pay for the claim. In addition to that the claimant was not working for the Confederate Government during the period for which the claim is sought to be recovered, but he was working for the Federal Government. The Federal Government states that that amount is credited and is due on the books of the United States to him. There is no evidence in the Confederate records in their possession that he received any pay during that time.

Mr. PAYNE. Where is that affidavit? The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] says that he did not find any such affidavit.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. There was some evidence produced that he had not been paid.

Mr. PAYNE. When did the Confederate Government commence to run a post-office department?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What has that got to do with this bill?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. It commenced May 1, 1861. That was the first time the Post-Office Department annulled all the Federal contracts in the Confederate States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, after the word "pay," insert the words "legal representative of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the title by inserting after the word "for the relief of" the words "the legal representatives of."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE P. WHITE.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 5079, Calendar No. 1731, for the relief of George P. White.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to release Capt. George P. White, Ninth United States Cavalry, from all liability resulting from the loss of $4,299.76, the unrecovered balance of stolen quartermaster funds for which he was responsible, the said sum now being charged against him on the books of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRAFF. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to give relief to Capt. George P. White. Captain White while stationed in the Philippine Islands and as a quartermaster was in charge of certain quartermaster's funds, which were kept in an old Spanish safe captured from the insurgents. It appears that the safe was broken open and that more than $6,000 in gold was carried away. It appears that the theft was traced to Corporal Robert Richardson, of Company H, and Private R. E. Williams, of Company G, of the Twenty-sixth United States Infantry, who were on detached duty as clerks, who slept in an adjoining room where the safe was kept. These men were arrested, and each confessed his guilt. They were tried by court-martial and found guilty of the theft, and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for a term of years.

A board of survey was convened, and after extended hearing of the evidence the board found that no blame was attached to Captain White. A part of the money was subsequently recovered, leaving a balance of $4,299.76 charged to account of Captain White, and which amount it is asked that he be relieved of, and which can only be relieved by an act of Congress or by a decision of the Court of Claims.

There is and can be no question af to the merits of this claim, and I ask that speedy action be taken and that relief be given as indicated in the bill.

This brief statement can be corroborated by departmental correspondence on file with the Committee on Claims, and which is incorporated in Report No. 2308, made by the chairman of that committee, the honorable, courteous, and obliging gentleman from Illinois, Mr. GRAFF. My statement can also be corroborated by members of this House who have personal knowledge of the case.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the money to be paid for?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is money that was stolen, and it is to be credited to the account of this claimant.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Has the Department recommended the payment of the claim?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the letter of the War Department in the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 14, 1902.

I have the honor to inform you that Capt. George P. White, Ninth United States Cavalry, charges himself on his account current for November, 1901 (fiscal year 1902), with $4,299.76 quartermaster's funds, stolen, as evidenced by a report of board of survey, also forwarded. This board, consisting of Maj. George F. Cooke, Twenty-sixth United States Infantry, president; Maj. H. D. Thomason, surgeon, United States Volunteers; and Capt. J. F. McBlain, Ninth United States Cavalry, recorder, convened by competent order at Nueva Caceres, P. I., on August 11, 1901, to examine into and report on the theft of public funds for which Captain White was responsible.

This examination was comprehensive and thorough, and the report is supported by the necessary certificates and affidavits, which are attached as exhibits.

From the testimony adduced it was shown that Corpl. Robert Richardson, Company H, and Private R. E. Williams, Company G, Twenty-sixth United States Infantry, on detached duty as clerks, and sleeping in an adjoining room to the quartermaster's safe, did, by breaking the padlock thereof by which it was secured, abstract therefrom, in the night, the following moneys: Quartermaster's funds, $4,825.76; secret-service funds, $250; captured funds, $632.50; deposits of employees for safe-keeping, $835; or a total of $6,603.26, of which $5,768.56 were public funds, for which Captain White was responsible, and $835 private funds.

The loss was discovered on the following morning and the men subsequently captured while attempting to escape. They separately confessed to the crime, and $846, concealed, was recovered, leaving a balance of public moneys of $4,922.06, which was presumably either squandered or further concealed by the thieves.

The conclusion of the board follows: "The board is of opinion that no blame can attach to Capt. George P. White, Ninth United States Cavalry, for the loss of this money, and recommends that he be relieved from the responsibility of the unrecovered balance, $4,922.06." The report of the board is approved by Gen. J. F. Wade, department commander. The culprits were subsequently sentenced by court-martial.

November 20, 1901, Captain White addressed this office, stating that the amount of $4,922.06 should be reduced by $596.20, the amount of quartermaster's funds comprised in the sum of $846.20 originally recovered, and by $26.10 subsequently recovered, leaving as a balance of quartermaster's funds with which he was charging himself until relief was secured $4,299.76, amount carried on his November account current.

The officer further requested that his communication be forwarded without delay to the Auditor for the War Department, in order that after the examination and statement of responsibility by the accounting officers of the Treasury he might speedily apply to the Court of Claims for the relief contemplated and authorized by section 1059 of the Revised Statutes, edition of 1878, and section 782, digest by McClure in 1901 of the decisions of the Judge-Advocate-General.

The money account for November, 1901, before mentioned, is the last received in this office from Captain White, and as it is learned informally in the office of the Auditor for the War Department that this account is not as yet audited, it is respectfully suggested that this communication and inclosures be referred to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, with the request that this matter be referred to the Auditor for the War Department for such action in the premises as is deemed proper, in order that the officer may obtain the relief from Congress as suggested.

Respectfully,

M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

[First indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 24, 1902.

Respectfully referred to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, with request for action in accordance with the wishes of the Quartermaster's Department, as indicated within.

WM. CARY SANGER,
Assistant Secretary of War.

[Second indorsement.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1902.

Respectfully referred to the Auditor for the War Department for such action as may be deemed proper in the premises.

H. A. TAYLOR,
Assistant Secretary.

[Third indorsement.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT,
March 3, 1902.

Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, with the following information: The quartermaster accounts of George P. White, captain, Ninth Cavalry, United States Army, from July 1 to November 30, 1901, are on file in this office. The accounts and accompanying papers show that in August, 1901, Captain White was on duty as quartermaster, at headquarters, third district, Department Southern Luzon, at Nueva Caceres, P. I. In this capacity he had in his possession and was responsible for certain public funds of the quartermaster's department, which he kept in a heavy iron safe in a building used only for administrative purposes. This was an old safe that had been abandoned by the Spanish and had been captured from the insurgents.

The fastenings of the safe had been two iron hasps with padlocks. One of these hasps had been broken for a long time; the other one was locked with a Yale padlock, the key to which Captain White kept in his possession, allowing no one but himself to open the safe. There was a military guard on duty outside the building day and night. Six picked soldiers were detailed as clerks at headquarters and slept in the building, and were considered an additional guard for the funds.

During all of the day and most of the night of August 7, 1901, Captain White was absent from the post on official business at Libmanan. In the afternoon of that day two of the clerks in the quartermaster's department discovered that the padlock on the safe was broken and that all funds had been taken out of the safe.

On his return to the post this fact was reported to Captain White, who at once reported the loss to the commanding officer, and together they proceeded to investigate the matter; whereupon the theft was traced to two clerks employed in the building. These clerks were found in a near-by town spending money freely. They were arrested, and each confessed his guilt. They were tried by court-martial, and each sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for a term of years. When the loss was discovered a board of survey was at once convened, and, after hearing all the evidence, found that no blame could attach to Capt. G. P. White for the loss of the money.

At the time the lock was broken there was in the safe, in addition to $835 deposits by individuals for safe-keeping, public funds amounting to $5,768.26. Of this there was recovered $1,468.50, leaving Captain White still reponsible for $4,299.76.

This is the amount with which he stands charged on the books of the Treasury and for which he can be relieved only by an act of Congress or decision of the Court of Claims.

The original copy of the proceedings of the board of survey and all the evidence in the case are on file in this office.

F. E. RITTMAN, Auditor.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 5, 1902.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War, attention being invited to the indorsement hereon, dated March 3, 1902, from the Auditor of the War Department, relative to the within subject.

O. L. SPAULDING,
Acting Secretary.

[Fifth indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 13, 1902.

Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of War.

The within report from this office, dated February 14, 1902, and the indorsement thereon of the Auditor for the War Department, fully set forth the facts and circumstances of this theft of money, and the quoted decision of the board of survey that no blame can attach to Captain White for the loss of this money, and the recommendation that he be relieved of the responsibility for the unrecovered balance, meets with approval.

Therefore, this office has no objection to and would favorably regard any proposed Congressional legislation which may suggest itself to Senator DOLLIVER as most fitting and likely to secure relief for the officers from the responsibility for these stolen funds.

And it is further considered that such a course would in all probability be productive of speedier results than would follow a reference of this matter to the Court of Claims, as suggested by Captain White himself, and would be more acceptable to the officer on that account.

M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

Mr. HAUGEN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I think enough has been read to show that this claim is——

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, let us have the whole report, or something.

Mr. HAUGEN. I thought sufficient had been read to show the justice of this claim. This is a letter of the War Department, in the report, stating that the money was stolen and that the parties pleaded guilty to the theft, and it was recommended that the amount stolen from Mr. White should be credited to his account and that he in no way be held responsible.

Mr. PAYNE. But the gentleman stopped the reading before the Clerk read the signature of the War Department.

Mr. GRAFF. We will have that read separately if the gentleman wants.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I am willing to take the gentleman's statement.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EDWARD S. CRILL.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 2422) for the relief of Edward S. Crill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Edward S. Crill, of Florida, the sum of $175, for rent of building for post-office in Palatka, Fla., for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1886.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for paying to the claimant the rent of the building used as a post-office in Palatka, Fla., for the last two quarters of 1886. This post-office was made a second-class office to take effect July 1, 1886, entitling claimant to rent at the rate of $350 per year from July 1, 1886; but, as it seems, no allowance for rent was made until January 1, 1887. The First Assistant Postmaster-General, who looked into the matter, has stated in writing to the committee that this is a just claim and should be paid; that the claimant is entitled to $175, being, as I have said, the rental for the last two quarters of 1886.

Mr. PAYNE. It appears that the Post-Office Department now holds that this rent should have been paid for the last half of 1886, notwithstanding the postal officers who were on the ground in 1886 decided that the rent should not commence until January 1, 1887. Of course, it is possible sometimes that officials are overpursuaded by the zeal of claimants, and go a little beyond the statements they ought to make.

Mr. DAVIS of Florida. I think I can explain this to the gentleman's satisfaction.

Mr. PAYNE. At the suggestion of my friend from California [Mr. LOUD] I ask to have the report read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2422) for the relief of Edward S. Crill, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment.

This is a bill enacting that—

"The Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Edward S. Crill, of Florida, the sum of $175 for rent of building for a post-office in Palatka, Fla., for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1886."

Mr. Crill, who is shown to the committee to be a highly reputable and honorable gentleman, makes his affidavit to the truth of his claim, which affidavit is hereto appended. The First Assistant Postmaster-General recommends the payment of the claim, and his letter, which is conclusive, is also hereto appended.

STATE OF FLORIDA, County of Putnam, ss:

Personally appeared before me E. S. Crill, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That he was the owner of the building in Palatka, Fla., in the year 1886 in which the post-office was located; that he was informed that an allowance for rent was made at the rate of $350 per year; that he was to receive for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1886 the sum of $175; that the post-office was situated in said building during the third and fourth quarters of the year 1886; that he never received any rent for the two said quarters of the year 1886; that he repeatedly wrote the Post-Office Department at Washington, asking that the rent be paid; that to these demands no reply was made; that the amount of $175 is still due and unpaid.

E. S. CRILL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of February, A. D. 1902.
[SEAL.] RICHARD F. ADAMS,
Notary Public, State of Florida at Large.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1902.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your communication dated the 19th instant, referring H. R. 2422 to the Postmaster-General for facts and opinion, and in reply would state that this bill is for the relief of Edward S. Crill, and that he be paid the sum of $175 for rent of building for post-office in Palatka, Fla., for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1886.

It appears from the records that the post-office at Palatka, Fla., was advanced to the second class, taking effect July 1, 1886, and that no rental was allowed at that office until January 1, 1887, upon which latter date rental in the sum of $350 per annum was fixed. As the post-office in question was entitled to a rental allowance from the 1st of July, 1886, it would appear therefore that the claim for rental in the sum of $175 for the third and fourth quarters of that year is a proper one.

Very respectfully,
WM. JOHNSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

FRANK J. BURROWS.

Mr. GRAFF. I call up the bill (S. 1206) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the account of Frank J. Burrows, late postmaster at Williamsport, State of Pennsylvania, to be credited with the sum of $4,022, and that he cause the said credit to be certified to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, being on account of loss of $3,500 in postage stamps and $522 in postal funds by robbery of said post-office on the 30th day of August, 1884, it appearing that said loss was without fault or negligence on the part of said late postmaster; and the said sum of $4,022 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay said claim.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] a statement from the Post-Office Department in regard to this case?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to have that read if it is not very long.

Mr. GRAFF. I read from the report:

A. G. Sharp, chief inspector, Post-Office Department, in a letter to Hon. William T. Price, dated January 13, 1885, in answer to one for information as to the robbery, says:

"A thorough examination was made by an inspector to ascertain if there was any evidence of collusion between the thieves and the employees of the Williamsport office, or any of them, but none could be found. * * * A rigid and searching investigation was made of the accounts of the office, and everything was found to be in good shape, except the losses before stated. The assistant postmaster has the absolute confidence of the postmaster, and, in fact, the confidence of everyone with whom he has come in business contact."

Then again:

J. M. Speese, the inspector of the Post-Office Department who investigated the said robbery within a few days after the same was committed, states, in a letter written by him to a member of this committee: "This robbery was planned by ingenious and bold thieves from New York, and due vigilance could not have prevented its execution." He also states: "I have always found the Williamsport post-office intelligently and carefully managed and the interests of the Department and the public carefully conducted."

The Post-Office Department, in a communication addressed to the Hon. Charles N. Brumm, chairman of the Committee on Claims, under date of January 29, 1896, says, relative to this claim:

I will, however, say that for several years this Department has been allowing claims for loss occurring under circumstances similar to this case, and if the claim was now presented to the Department for the first time, it would be recommended for allowance as coming within the purview of the act of Congress of May 9, 1888. (Sup. to R. S. of 1891, pp. 585-586.)

Very respectfully,
JOHN L. THOMAS,
Assistant Attorney-General, Post-Office Department.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to say that this explanation is very satisfactory. Here an independent party goes and makes an examination—two of them, I believe—and find the facts; and according to the facts thus ascertained the United States ought to make payment. I want to commend the gentleman from Illinois for the satisfactory evidence in this one case anyway.

Mr. GRAFF. I appreciate the gentleman's compliment. [Laughter.] I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. LOUD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois something about the facts of this case—as to how the robbery took place. I have an indistinct recollection of this case. I believe it has been up before, has been discussed by the House, and adversely acted upon.

Mr. GRAFF. A similar bill was reported at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress; again, at the first session of the Fifty-second Congress; again, at the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress. So far as the facts are concerned, they are set forth in the report. Of course, I was not personally in Williamsport at the time that this robbery took place.

Mr. LOUD. We all understand that.

A MEMBER (to Mr. GRAFF). We acquit you. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAFF. I never was suspected. [Laughter.] I read again from the report:

That Frank J. Burrows was postmaster at the city of Williamsport, Pa., from 1882 to ——; that on the 30th day of August, 1884, the said post-office was robbed of 50,000 1-cent postage stamps and 150,000 2-cent stamps, aggregating in value $3,500, and also of $22 in money.

The said robbery was committed about a quarter to 12 o'clock (noon), when the postmaster, clerks, carriers, and employees of the post-office were at dinner, with the exception of the assistant postmaster, the mailing clerk, and the delivery and stamp clerk. The mailing clerk was busy at his desk. The delivery and stamp clerk was at the general-delivery window, and the assistant postmaster, Mr. Shay, was occupied in the money-order office in the rear part of the office. The stamps and money stolen were in an iron safe belonging to the Department, and furnished for that purpose by the Department. The stamps were in the original packages in which they had been sent to the post-office.

While so engaged as aforesaid a boy came in and told the assistant postmaster that a gentleman in a buggy in front of the door wished to speak to him. Mr. Shay, the assistant postmaster, at once left his work and went to the door. The man in the buggy said he was sorry to have brought him out, but he was lame and could not get out of the buggy. He then said that he wanted to ask him how he would have to proceed to get seeds from the Department, etc. Mr. Shay replied that he was not able to give him the information, but supposed he could get them through the member of Congress from his district. Mr. Shay then returned to his office, not having been gone, as he thinks, more than three or four minutes. That afternoon it was discovered that the stamps mentioned had been taken from the safe and packages similar in size and appearance substituted for them; also that the money mentioned had been stolen. It is supposed that while the man in the buggy engaged the assistant postmaster in conversation a confederate, or confederates, entered by a side door from the alley or through a window and committed the robbery. Diligent effort was made by the postmaster and the inspectors and officials of the Post-Office Department to discover and apprehend the thieves, but without success.

Now, then, if any suspicion under these circumstances (putting the most unfavorable view for the claimant) is to rest upon anybody, it would be the assistant postmaster, an official under the postmaster himself. Yet the postmaster is the one chargeable with these fnnds, and who must suffer by reason of any negligence or lack of good judgment on the part of the assistant postmaster in walking out to the curb to engage in conversation with the man in the buggy, who was probably a confederate of the man who abstracted the stamps.

I do not see anything wrong whatever in this matter. The bill, as I understand, seeks to credit Mr. Burrows with this amount stolen, which remains charged against him upon the books of the Department.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he assumes due precaution was used on the part of this official when he went out to talk to a man on the street and left his safe open?

Mr. GRAFF. It seems there were other employees in the office.

Mr. LOUD. It was his duty to have charge of the safe and the stamps.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; that is true. Yet the postmaster employed this man, and I do not think, as a legal proposition, if the United States Government would commence a suit against the postmaster to recover this fund and it was discovered that the fund was stolen through the negligence of the assistant postmaster, that a recovery could be had against the postmaster unless it were shown that the postmaster had appointed some one who bore a bad reputation and had not exercised due diligence in the selection of his employee, if, perchance, the assistant postmaster was appointed under his recommendation.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer a suggestion in respect to this bill. I thought I recognized the bill by its earmarks when it first came up. This is not the first time this bill has been before the House of Representatives and has received consideration, my recollection being that at the time it was considered before the bill was acted upon adversely by the House of Representatives. However that may be, it was considered, and it never has become a law. There is something peculiar about the history of this case. If the gentleman would go back into the records when this case was discussed before, he would find a similarity existing between this case and many others throughout the country. When this bill first came up I was reminded of reports I have frequently seen of officials of the Post-Office Department who were charged with a too free use of intoxicating liquors. If you go into the Department to-day, you will find an official charged with being intoxicated while on duty, in probably four cases out of six, offers this as an excuse: "Severe pains in the stomach. Understanding that blackberry brandy was good for a pain of that character, took one drink; stomach being empty, became intoxicated." Now, there were before Congress at the time this bill was first reported five or six cases almost exactly similar in every particular.

I want to call the attention of the House to the similarity of these cases as they came up, one after another. This is clearly a case of negligence on the part of the postmaster or the assistant postmaster. If the gentleman will hunt back in the records he will find that in another case some member of the postmaster's lodge came and sent a boy in with the report that he wanted to see him out on the street—similar enough to be almost the same story. So many of these cases were before Congress at that time that a suspicion arose, I think, in the minds of the members of Congress that such a story having been originated in one case it was thought well to apply it to similar cases. Now, this House can not say but that the grossest negligence took place. In the first place, if an officer in charge of that amount of Government money in stamps went out on the street and left his safe open for any person to go and abstract its contents, it was the grossest negligence.

Mr. GRAFF. And yet, is it not true, I will ask the gentleman from California, that those things are being done by human beings?

Mr. LOUD. Why, of course; and men should be made to suffer for them.

Mr. GRAFF. Does the gentleman from California think that the postmaster himself should be made to suffer for the negligence of his assistant postmaster?

Mr. LOUD. I want to say that if the gentleman will delve down a little deeper into this case and give us the reports of more inspectors than he has published in his report, he will find a doubt, a reasonable doubt, in the mind of some one who investigated this case as to whether these stamps were not abstracted before this man went out on the street. That will be true in this case as well as in some others. Now, the doubt did arise in the minds of the members of the House whether these stamps were abstracted at that moment or had been taken before. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. GRAFF. I only wish to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEEMER] says that the claimant in the case is a man of the highest reputation in the community—a man whose reputation would rebut any insinuation that he would be guilty of theft or crime against the Government. He was an old soldier and a man who bore the reputation of being an honest citizen all through a long residence at his home in Williamsport.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN D. CHADWICK.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I call up Calendar No. 1691, being the bill (H. R. 8186) for the relief of John D. Chadwick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John D. Chadwick, of Madison County, Ala., the sum of $97.04 to pay and discharge in full an account held by him against the Government of the United States for $97.04, arising from certain transactions in the administration of justice in the Federal courts at Huntsville, Ala.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I move to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Let us have some explanation of it. The amount is small, but still we ought to know what it is for.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this claim originates under sections 846 and 850 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which authorize a United States commissioner to issue certificates to witnesses who attend upon legal processes duly executed upon them to appear before his court. It appears and is the fact that there were thirteen of these witness certificates issued, amounting to $97.04. The documentary evidence shows, as certified to by the clerk of the United States circuit court for the northern district of the northern division of Alabama, that the formal, regular, and legal issuance of these witness certificates regularly appear upon the rolls of the United States court; that the commissioner regularly issued them in due process of law by reason of his expense account, as allowed under the Statutes of the United States that I have just referred to.

The marshal to whom these certificates were presented for payment was the incoming marshal of the United States. He had just been inducted into office and had no money at that time, and the certificates were not paid and have not been paid since. The documentary evidence is clear that they were regularly issued in the due process of the administration of justice; that they have not been paid; that they appear upon the pay rolls by the certificate of the clerk now in office. The amount is $97.04; the Government owes the debt fairly. There is no mistake about the fact that the claim is fair, just, and unpaid; this is shown by the records of the court. I hope the bill will pass.

I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PAYMASTER JAMES E. TOLFREE.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up Calendar No. 1945, being House bill 14357, for the relief of Paymaster James E. Tolfree, United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James E. Tolfree, paymaster, United States Navy, the sum of $4,000, said sum to be a payment in full for all losses of both Government and personal property incurred by him by reason of the destruction by fire of the Windsor House at Yokohama, Japan, on the morning of February 8, 1886.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have read the report in this case. I have no questions to ask if there is no other member of the committee who has any curiosity.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, there was a Senate bill covering this same thing exactly, Senate bill 5724, which was referred to the Committee on Claims on January 12, 1903, but has not been reported by the committee. Could I obtain unanimous consent to have Senate bill 5724 substituted for the House bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that if the Senate bill is now pending in the Committee on Claims, it is not within the power of the Committee of the Whole to discharge that committee from the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GRAFF. The House can do it if it desires.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done in the House.

FRANK J. BURROWS.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I ask that House bill 2413, for the relief of Frank J. Burrows, which is a bill identical with the Senate bill that just passed the committee, do lie upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the bill (H. R. 2413) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—KOONCE AGAINST GRADY.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I now call up Calendar No. 1813, being the bill (H. R. 4240) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to defray the expenses of the contestant in the contest entitled "Koonce against Grady."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Frank D. Koonce, of the Third Congressional district of the State of North Carolina, the sum of $1,921.70, as amount of expenses incurred by him as contestant for a seat in the Fifty-third Congress in the contest entitled "Koonce against Grady."

With an amendment striking out "$1,921.70" and inserting "$1,000."

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to have some explanation of this bill. It appears that this is to pay the expenses of an election contest in the Fifty-third Congress. That was some time ago. Of course it was the duty of that Congress to provide for it under the statute. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, at the fall elections in 1892 Frank D. Koonce was the Populist candidate, with Republican support, against B. F. Grady, for Representative from the Third Congressional district of North Carolina, which I now represent. Mr. Grady was elected. Mr. Koonce served his notice of contest upon Mr. Grady and proceeded to take testimony in pursuance of that notice of contest. He took a part of the testimony, which was sent up to the Clerk of the House and opened on June 22, 1893. Mr. Koonce was proceeding to collect his testimony in the different counties of the district, specifications having been made in the notice as to four different counties. He had collected part of the testimony on his behalf as contestant.

Every man who has had a contest, and I have been so unfortunate as to have one, knows that the contestant's first move is to collect testimony. While Mr. Koonce was collecting and taking his testimony his house was burned. That was an unfortunate accident, for which Mr. Koonce was, of course, in no way responsible. He thereupon requested the Committee on Elections, which had charge of his case, to give him further time within which to take testimony, in view of the fact that his house had been burned which contained many important and valuable papers and writings connected with the case, together with names of witnesses and testimony which he and his counsel had collected, as stated in the committee's report. If he had done as Mr. Grady, the Democratic contestee did, and had the account of expenses of his contest certified by the Committee on Elections to the Committee on Appropriations it would have been allowed by that Congress—the Fifty-third Congress. He was awaiting, however, the action of the Committee on Elections upon his motion and request for further time, and let the Fifty-third Congress close without filing his expense account.

Now, the gentleman from New York knows that under these circumstances his only relief was to come before the Committee on Claims and ask that committee to allow him the account. This is not an excess, but within the $2,000 limit allowed by Congress in election contests. There has been no laches in the matter. In the Fifty-fifth Congress a bill was introduced for the relief of Mr. Koonce by Mr. FOWLER, who then represented the Third Congressional district. I introduced a similar bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and also in this Congress. Mr. Koonce put in an account for $1,900, but the committee cut it down to $1,000, for the reason that they thought the counsel fees were excessive. He filed an itemized account for personal expenses incurred in collecting and taking his testimony, for counsel fees, clerical assistance, etc. The committee reported unanimously in favor of allowing the sum of $1,000, reducing the claim about one-half, deeming this amount just and equitable. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand the gentleman, the Committee on Elections failed to give him additional time?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Yes; they failed to give him additional time or act upon his motion.

Mr. HULL. Did the contestant get the $2,000?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. The contestant is the claimant who presented this bill. He did not receive a penny, and did not proceed with the case. The contestee, Mr. Grady, as I am informed, received his allowance.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

COL. H. B. FREEMAN.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up Calendar No. 754, House bill 6637.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6637) for the relief of Col. H. B. Freeman.

Be it enacted, etc., That Col. H. B. Freeman, Twenty-fourth United States Infantry, be, and is hereby, relieved from the obligation to refund the sum of $1,761.60, paid to him under a decision of the Acting Secretary of War as commutation of quarters while on duty as acting Indian agent, Osage Agency, Pawhuska, Okla., from the 10th day of December, 1893, to the 31st day of December, 1896, both inclusive, which decision was held by the accounting officers of the Treasury to be erroneous, notwithstanding that the monthly claims which were based upon it had been tacitly approved by them and paid, month by month, for upward of three years.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out the word "held" in the twelfth line and insert in lieu thereof the word "overruled."

Strike out the words "accounting officer" in line 12 and insert the word "Comptroller."

Strike out the words "to be erroneous" in the twelfth and thirteenth lines; also the word "tacitly" in the fourteenth line; and strike out the word "them" in the fourteenth line and insert in lieu thereof the words "the auditing officers."

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas to give an explanation of the bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the relief of Col. H. B. Freeman, who asks that he be released from an alleged obligation to pay $1,761.60, an amount paid him month by month as commutation for quarters under a decision of the Secretary of War that he was entitled thereto. About three years after this decision was overruled by the Comptroller of the Treasury, as set forth in the memorandum indorsements of the War Department which appear in this report. The facts were that Col. Freeman, who has been a soldier in the Army for a period of nearly forty-two years, was stationed at a post in the Indian Territory, and the same commutation was granted to him for quarters that had been granted to his predecessor for many years, and that amount had been paid to his predecessors and no claim ever made against any of them to recover from them the repayment of the amount.

After he had been stationed there for a period of nearly three years, and had drawn this amount, $1,761.60, the Comptroller of the Treasury held that he was not entitled to this amount and asked that he refund this sum to the Government of the United States. At that time he was in Cuba, and after his return home he asked the Treasury Department to hold this matter up until he could have an opportunity to present it to Congress. A bill was presented here for his relief and was referred to the War Department. The Judge-Advocate-General reported to the committee that he could see no objection to the bill for the relief asked for. The report was concurred in by the Adjutant-General, Mr. Corbin, and Secretary of War, Mr. Root, and these indorsements are with this case. After Colonel Freeman returned from Cuba he was sent to the Philippine Islands and served there until the close of the war, when he returned to the United States and is now stationed at Fort Leavenworth. This is a most meritorious case. I think that the report of this committee ought to be adopted, and I move that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN F. LAWSON.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 7864) to pay John F. Lawson $237.96, balance due him for services as United States mail carrier.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, directed to pay to John F. Lawson, of Hickman County, Tenn., the sum of $237.96, being the balance owing to him for services rendered as United States mail carrier on route No. 10013, Tennessee, from January 1 to November 29, 1861, and said sum will be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if this is another one of the mail carriers' bills?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. This is another one of the mail contractors' claims for a balance found to be due on the books of the Treasury Department. The objections which the gentleman from New York has heretofore made are removed in this claim, because the claimant has made an affidavit, filed and printed with the report, that he never received a copper cent from anyone, and never entered the mail service of the Confederate States.

Mr. PAYNE. Does he account for the money he received belonging to the United States up to the 31st of May?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes; and that goes to his credit, and then the balance is $237.96.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this claim ought to be paid. I believe they have already been paid, every one of them, notwithstanding the affidavits of reputable gentlemen after forty-odd years. This is no new claim; it is no new class of claims. It was brought in here as early as the Forty-sixth Congress. The whole matter was thoroughly ventilated and the claims investigated, and the author of them retired, in not an altogether creditable manner, with the claims that he had brought here. Now, I do not feel like taking the time of the House, and yet the House ought to know something about the character of these claims.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. On what ground were the claims rejected?

Mr. PAYNE. On the ground that they had been paid and that John H. Reagan had taken the receipts from the very men who came in here asking for payment.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Did it appear that this man had been paid?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; a bill was introduced here for all of these claimants.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. How does the gentleman know that one of them was this man?

Mr. PAYNE. A claim of hundreds of thousands of dollars was brought into this House on the report of the committee that these bills be paid, and it was found that Mr. Reagan, postmaster-general of the Confederate States, had taken the money that belonged to the United States up to May 31, 1861, the money that was paid for postage stamps, the money that came in as revenue to the United States Government, and out of that had paid for carrying the mail, paid the expenses, and if there was anyone left out it was the fault of the man and not the fault of Mr. Reagan, the postmaster-general. Notwithstanding that, in the Forty-fifth Congress these men had the cheek to come in here in a body and ask the Congress of the United States to appropriate money to pay them all. Some of them were named in the resolution and their names appeared before the Congress and they dug out, because the committee then—I do not say that this committee has not used due diligence—used diligence enough to go to the records and find the receipts of these men in their own handwriting, showing that they were paid for the very claims that they came here and asked to be paid for.

I submit that we ought to go a little slow with these claims before we pay them. Now, I have not the time, and I know I ought not to take the time, to read what was said on that occasion. If I undertook to state the pith of it—it was so long ago—I would not be able to do it without reading the whole account. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was in Congress at the time, and he has examined somewhat into this subject, and is quite familiar with the facts. I ask him if this matter was not fully investigated at that time, and if the claims were not abandoned under the light that was thrown upon them after investigation by a committee of the House?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think the inquiry embodied in the statement of the gentleman from New York is substantially correct. It was in the Forty-fifth Congress when this matter was thoroughly discussed and completely ventilated. The previous Congress had passed a bill appropriating some $300,000 for the payment of this class of claims. In a controversy that came up over a bill making additional appropriation it was found that the property of the United States in the hands of the postmasters in the seceded States up to the end of May had been detained by order of the Confederate government.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. But the Department has given the United States credit for all that was paid at this time, and this is the balance that has not been paid and is still due.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was speaking of this class of claims.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. And those claimants continued in the mail service of the Confederate States.

Mr. HEPBURN. This related to all of those claims. The whole sum resulting from the postage stamps, of money, and all property in the hands of the postmasters during the early days of the Confederacy up to the 31st of May, was retained in their hands and finally turned over to the Postmaster-General and kept as a separate fund for the purpose of compensating persons then in the postal service under the authority of the United States. All persons were required to file their claims, and claims to the amount of more than $500,000 were filed and were paid for, as is shown by the report of the Postmaster-General as they were read on the floor of the House, as the gentleman will find by reading the controversy or the debate that took place in 1878, I think it was, on this subject.

I have not the least doubt that all these claims have been paid; and I think it would be very unsafe to take as proof the interested statements of the claimants that they had not received their compensation. The presumption is that they were paid. There was an abundant fund out of which to pay them. There was notice that they should file their claims; an opportunity was given for that purpose; and I have not any doubt that they did so. A large part of these claims, presented in the previous Congress, to which I have referred, were, as I am advised, abandoned, because of the light that was then thrown upon the subject in debate.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill. I have here a letter of Mr. Henry A. Castle, Auditor of the Treasury Department, in which he states that the records show that this amount is due to Mr. Lawson, and also that he has the Confederate records, which fail to show any payment of the claim. I have also the affidavit of Mr. Lawson, the claimant, that he never was paid for this service by the Confederate Government, and that he did not carry the mails in the Confederate service; that he only carried the mail in the Federal service. He is an honorable gentleman; he is worthy of belief; and I can not see how his sworn testimony can be overthrown by vague presumptions, such as are intimated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. This is an honest claim, and ought to be paid.

Several MEMBERS. Read the letter.

Mr. PADGETT. I have the letter here, but it is not worth while to take up time in reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

AUSTIN A. YATES.

Mr. GRAFF. I call up the bill (H. R. 4178) for the relief of Austin A. Yates.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to settle the accounts of Austin A. Yates, late captain, Fourteenth Veteran Reserve Corps, and to give him credit for the sum of $13,537.50, charged to him on the books of the Second Auditor's Office, said sum having been stolen from the safe of his office at Syracuse, N. Y., on the night of March 25, 1865, while he was acting provost-marshal of the twenty-third district of New York: Provided, That it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of said accounting officers that Captain Yates was not responsible for the loss of said moneys.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

N. F. PALMER, JR., & CO.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I call up the bill (H. R. 13703) for the relief of N. F. Palmer, jr., & Co., of New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust the claim of N. F. Palmer, jr., & Co., of New York City, doing business under the name of Quintard Iron Works, for loss and damage due to delays alleged to have been caused by the Government in the construction of the machinery of the United States armored cruiser Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House?

Mr. RHEA. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes a reference to the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of ascertaining the damages sustained by the claimants in the construction of the battle ship Maine on account of the failure of the Government to comply with the contract. The passage of the bill has been recommended by two Secretaries of the Navy, and also by the Chief of Engineers of the Navy. The bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Was not this claim presented to the Spanish Claims Commission, and has it not been adjudicated by that Commission?

Mr. RHEA. I understand that the matter has been investigated at the Navy Department, the amount ascertained to which these parties are entitled, and a bill favorably reported to the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand, these parties brought their claim before the Spanish Claims Commission, by whom it was adjudicated, and there was a finding that they had no claim against the United States.

Mr. RHEA. I understand that the Secretary of the Navy has reported this matter to the Senate, the amount due under this claim has been ascertained, and bill for payment favorably reported.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. RHEA. About $60,000. The bill does not make any appropriation, but simply refers the matter to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that large claims in connection with this matter were made before the Spanish Claims Commission. I have been trying to ascertain whether this claim is of the same character as those that were presented to the Commission.

Mr. BABCOCK. I should like to know how this claim arose.

Mr. RHEA. I will read a letter of Secretary Long, under date of April 21, 1902:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 21, 1902.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 17th instant inclosing a copy of the bill (H. R. 13703) for the relief of N. F. Palmer, jr., & Co., of New York, by reimbursement of damages sustained by them in connection with their contract for the machinery for the Maine, and requesting an expression of opinion as to merits of the bill, I have the honor to inclose herewith copies of the Department's letter of April 11, 1896, to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, and of a report dated the 9th of said month by the Bureau of Steam Engineering relative to delays occasioned by the Government to Messrs. Palmer & Co. in the construction of the machinery for the armored cruiser Maine.

The suggestion made in the letter above mentioned that, as the company named was hindered in the completion of the machinery for said vessel by delay on the part of the Government in the construction of the hull, the Department be authorized to ascertain the extent of the delay and the resulting damage to the contractors, and to report thereon to Congress as soon as practicable for its consideration, is renewed.

Very respectfully,

JNO. D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

There is also a letter from Secretary Herbert to the same effect.

Mr. PAYNE. I see that this is a different matter from what I had in my mind.

Mr. RHEA. The effect of the bill is simply to refer the claim to the Secretary of the Navy for the ascertainment of the amount due.

I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RHEA,

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 67, noes 1.

Mr. BABCOCK. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the Committee of the Whole). There are 150 members present—more than a quorum. The ayes have it, and the bill is laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

LEBBEUS H. ROGERS.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 12064) for the relief of Lebbeus H. Rogers and the administrators of William B. Moses, deceased.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Lebbeus H. Rogers and the administrators of William B. Moses, deceased, are hereby authorized to pay into the Treasury of the United States $12,000, being the principal sum named in the official bond of Henry W. Howgate upon which said William B. Moses, deceased, and said Rogers were sureties, and such payment shall be received in full satisfaction and discharge of all obligations whatsoever of said parties to the United States thereunder, and in full satisfaction and discharge of all judgments entered against said Rogers or said administrators in favor of the United States upon the said bond, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon receiving such payment, to satisfy said judgments, and each of them, of record: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting in any manner the liability of said Howgate or his legal representatives to the United States on said bond or otherwise.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 4, page 1, after the word "authorized," insert the words "within thirty days after the passage of this act."

In line 8, page 1, after the word "payment," insert the words "together with court costs in the suits against them."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if this is the same case where the House passed a bill in a former Congress releasing without the payment of any money.

Mr. GRAFF. It is.

Mr. PAYNE. And now this proposes to release upon the payment of $12,000?

Mr. GRAFF. That is the principal of the bond, without interest, and we have recommended that there be inserted, in addition to that, a time limit, that they shall pay within thirty days after the passage of the act, and shall pay the costs of the court. There is a recommendation from the Attorney-General.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to congratulate the gentleman on the progress his committee is making.

Mr. GRAFF. Well, the gentleman is rendering us assistance right along.

I move that the bill be laid aside as amended with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID SMITH.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] has a bill which he would like to call up, and as far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6034) raising the rank of Chief Engineer David Smith, on the retired list of the Navy.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Chief Engineer David Smith, United States Navy, retired, who served with credit through both the civil and Spanish-American wars, and who, in the performance of duty, incurred disability from exposure, rendering him an invalid requiring the services of an attendant ever since his detachment, February 7, 1899, be advanced on the retired list from March 3, 1899, to the next higher grade.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], who reported this bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs. He is entirely familiar with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill in behalf an engineer officer of the United States Navy, who came up from the ranks——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I shall object if this is going to take up any time in debate.

Mr. DAYTON. I think it will not, and I think when the gentleman understands the circumstances he will not want his objection to stand.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let it go; I am satisfied; take a vote.

Mr. DAYTON. Very well, let us have a vote.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have some explanation, notwithstanding the fact that the gentleman from Georgia is satisfied.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would say that the beneficiary is not likely to live more than two weeks. It seems like a simple act of justice.

Mr. BABCOCK. The beneficiary is on his deathbed to-day.

Mr. DAYTON. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

M. L. COBB.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 3748) for the relief of M. L. Cobb.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay M. L. Cobb, administrator of W. W. Cobb, deceased, the sum of $1,755.49, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same being the amount of salary for the unexpired part of the current year in which the said W. W. Cobb, who was consul of the United States at Colon, Colombia, departed this life.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear some explanation of that. I want to say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], who seems to be interested in having this business progress, that if he has any bill which he desires to call up, all he has to do is to raise the point of no quorum and await developments. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend from New York, who seems to be interested that nothing should be done, especially that from a certain section of this country, that I stand ready to defend anything which I think is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this is the first intimation I have had that this is a sectional affair. I supposed these bills were from all over the United States. Now, that may account for the zeal of my friend from Georgia, but it does not account for my actions, for it does not make any difference to me.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest that the gentleman has had one through to-day and that is more than I have had, and I have not one behind, either.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I have not any bills at all. Mr. Chairman, I hope we will have an explanation of the bill now pending.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, this Mr. Cobb, whom President McKinley appointed as consul to Colon, contracted fever at that point and died. This is to pay the rest of his year's salary. It has been customary in a great many cases where a consul dies—and Secretary Hay cites numerous cases—to pay to his family the rest of his year's salary, just as we do in the case of a Congressman's death. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM DUGDALE.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up Calendar No. 1499, being Senate bill 3555, for the relief of William Dugdale.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to give credit to William Dugdale, postmaster at Noroton Heights, Conn., on his money-order account, for the sum of $2,102.87, being the balance now charged against him on account of certain money orders obtained by fraud in 1894 by one Leroy Harris, who was afterwards arrested for said offense, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear an explanation of this, and I call the attention of my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to the fact that this is a Connecticut case.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, this bill passed the House unanimously in the Fifty-sixth Congress and went to the Senate. The Senate Committee on Post-Office Affairs had no further meetings, and no action was taken. The bill was introduced by Senator Platt in the Senate, and by myself in the House in the present Congress, was reported favorably by the Senate Committee, passed the Senate unanimously, and has come over here. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Claims, and also unanimously by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, from the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] is chairman.

The robbers in this case have been arrested, part of the money has been secured by the United States Government, both of the men are under sentence of six years, I think, one in Joliet and the other in Auburn, N. Y., and the Post-Office Department have held up the adjudication of the amount until Congress can act. There is no sort of question about the justice of the claim, and I hope we may have a vote.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY P. MONTGOMERY, EXECUTOR.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I call up Calendar No. 1410, being the bill (H. R. 6516) for the relief of Henry P. Montgomery, surviving executor of Granville Garnett, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Henry P. Montgomery, surviving executor of Granville Garnett, deceased, late of Owen County, State of Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,280.50, being a refund of the amount paid by said Garnett to the United States, October 7, 1865, in satisfaction of a judgment of the United States circuit court for the district of Kentucky against him as surety on a peace bond of one W. G. Humber, which judgment had theretofore been remitted by the President of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANHEUSER-BUSCH BREWING ASSOCIATION.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (Calendar No. 1009, H. R. 9063) to refund certain taxes paid by the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association, of St. Louis, Mo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $986.32, to be paid to the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association, of St. Louis, Mo., for refunding part of the tax paid on beer on hand or in transit on June 14, 1898, the date when the war-revenue act went into effect.

The following amendment, recommended by the committee, was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and consider all claims of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association for the refunding of 7½ per cent discount upon the taxes paid upon fermented liquors in storage or in transit June 14, 1898, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding, and to allow such portion of said claim as shall be shown to him to have been illegally collected in excess of the amount required by law; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as shall be certified by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have been illegally collected from the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association as tax on fermented liquors in storage or in transit, June 14, 1898."

Mr. GRAFF. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to know how this claim arises?

Mr. GRAFF. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill in question, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9063) entitled "A bill to refund certain taxes paid by the Anheuser-Bush Brewing Association, of St. Louis, Mo.," beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass with amendment hereinafter set forth:

Which provides for a direct appropriation of the specific amount.

Your committee after carefully examining bill H. R. 9063 were unanimously in favor of reporting the same favorably. The claimants say in a letter addressed to Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT, M. C., under date of January 7, 1902, that "regarding our claims for the refunding of 7½ per cent on additional tax on all beer on hand, in the hands of our agencies, or in transit thereto on the morning of June 14, 1898, amounting to $986.32, they were filed as soon as they could be gotten ready after Attorney-General Griggs rendered his decision or opinion on June 4, 1900. Extensive correspondence had been carried on both with the collector and Commissioner of Internal Revenue on the refunding of the 7½ per cent."

The claimants further say that "the claims of most of the breweries of the United States were paid," and the committee deem it but justice to the claimants who paid in the year just closed into the Treasury of the United States as taxes on beer the enormous sum of $1,881,818.25, that the Government might waive the brief delay of the claimants in the premises.

The committee therefore wrote a letter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue advising him that the committee desired to amend bill H. R. 9063 so as to authorize and direct examination and action upon said claim for the refunding of taxes upon the claims now on file of said claimants in the Treasury Department the same as if said claim had been filed by said claimants prior to the limit provided by law, and received the following reply:

Here is what the Commissioner says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, March 27, 1902.

SIR: Receipt is hereby acknowledged of your letter of the 24th instant, in which you say that the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives have voted to report the bill (H. R. 9063) entitled "A bill to refund certain taxes paid by the Anheuser-Busch Association, of St. Louis, Mo.," but amended so as to simply authorize and direct either the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Secretary of the Treasury, whichever would be proper, to examine and act upon said claim for the refunding of taxes upon the claims now on file of said claimants in the Treasury Department the same as if said claims had been filed by said claimants prior to the limit.

You request that I have drafted a proper form of an amendment to said bill and state that it is desired that the bill shall appropriate such amount, if any, as is allowed upon auditing such claim.

In compliance with your request, I submit the following amendment to the bill:

That is the amendment which has been read and recommended by the committee.

It might be stated, however, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is not favorable to the extension of the time, but notwithstanding that fact the committee recommend that the bill do pass, amended as follows:

And then this sets forth the proposed amendment.

The Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association has a number of branches. It conducts business upon a large scale. As I remember it there was some question about the interpretation of the law, and it was submitted to Attorney-General Griggs for him to render an opinion for the direction of the Department. This caused some delay in filing these claims, during the time that was allowed for their filing. As soon as these people heard of the opinion of the Attorney-General they proceeded to collect the statistics and the material upon which to base their claims, from their various agencies. The claim upon which this sum of $900 is based reached the Commissioner of Internal Revenue only a few days after the expiration of the time limit.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course these gentlemen knew all about the time limit. It was not a new law, as I recollect it. The claim for 7½ per cent must be made within a certain time.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, and they were entitled to it if they had filed their claim within the time. Of course, the Commissioner had no discretion in the premises.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not see any excuse for their laches, and I was wondering if the committee did.

Mr. GRAFF. Their excuse for delay in the premises was that they did not get their material to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in time, on account of waiting for the final opinion of the Attorney-General, which was delayed.

Mr. PAYNE. They had been filing these claims right along for years.

Mr. GRAFF. But the gentleman knows it is true that the opinion of the Attorney-General was not rendered until a large portion of the time during which they could file their claims had elapsed.

Mr. PAYNE. They were put in all the time.

Mr. GRAFF. There is no question but what these people were entitled to that under the law. They do a very large business and they have paid a very large amount of revenue to the Government, and there is no reason why they should not be paid.

Mr. PAYNE. I think you ought to deal out even-handed justice to the little as well as the larger one.

Mr. OTJEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question if he will yield to me.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. OTJEN. As I understand this bill, it refunds to Annheuser-Busch the redeemed stamps on beer that was in transit.

Mr. PAYNE. No; this is the 7 per cent discount.

Mr. OTJEN. And also in redemption of the stamps?

Mr. GRAFF. No; this only covers 7½ per cent discount.

Mr. OTJEN. Because there are claims from other brewing companies.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE C. ELLISON.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I now call up for consideration Calendar No. 1153, House bill 3385.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3385) for the relief of George C. Ellison.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the payment in part on account of fees, costs, and disbursements paid and incurred by George C. Ellison, late chief engineer of the House of Representatives, in two trials in the case of the United States against George C. Ellison.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the bill was introduced by the late Amos J. Cummings. It was favorably reported, and similar bills have been reported, I think, in eight preceding Congresses. It seems that while Ellison was in discharge of his duty as chief engineer of the House of Representatives, in 1877, he was savagely attacked by one David Small, a subordinate employee. The result of the encounter was that Small was severely wounded, and as a result of the wound died. Ellison was indicted for murder and was tried. I understand there were two trials upon the indictment.

Ellison was acquitted, and Judge Wylie, before whom the case was tried, wrote a letter which briefly shows that the killing was done in self-defense. Not only was it done in self-defense, but the blow struck by Ellison was in order to prevent Small from imperiling the lives of members of this House. Small had entered the engine room. He had been goaded on by revenge. He had been discharged, and evidently that preyed upon his mind. He was in an intoxicated state, and in that intoxicated state entered the engine room and attacked Ellison. I send to the Clerk's desk the letter of Judge Wylie, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 22, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor dated January 22 last, from the Ebbitt House, was never seen by me till this morning. It came to my house, doubtless, while I was at court and was mislaid.

I do not suppose that you desire that I should make a statement at length of the evidence or even of the facts which were proven on the trial of The United States v. Ellison. I shall therefore merely give at present the conclusion to which my mind was brought by the evidence in that case.

The defendant was tried for the murder of a man named Small. (I believe this was the name of the deceased.) Ellison's character had always been excellent, and at the time of the homicide he filled a place of confidence and trust at the Capitol. Small had previously been an employee there in a place subordinate to that of Ellison, and had been removed. He was a person of violent temper and intemperate habits. He thought Ellison had been instrumental in having him removed, and had made threats against the latter, which had been told to Ellison. One morning he entered Ellison's room at the Capitol and made demonstrations which, taken in connection with the threats, were well calculated to create alarm in Ellison for his personal safety.

Ellison sprang up from the sofa where he was lying, seized a billet of wood, and struck Small on the head. Small fell, but soon got up again and went away, no one supposing that the injury was fatal. He was drinking pretty hard for several days afterwards, but went about the city. It turned out that the skull had been fractured, and at the expiration, I think, of about nine days he died.

I thought, from all the evidence, that Mr. Ellison had good reasons for apprehending great bodily danger from the deceased, and that it was a case of justifiable homicide, and of that opinion was the jury.

It is always nearly a misfortune to be obliged to take human life even in self-defense, but in this instance I think Mr. Ellison should be held to have been without reproach.

Truly, yours,

ANDREW WYLIE.

Hon. S. L. MAYHAM.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Now, the amount called for by the bill is about half of the amount actually expended, as the committee has found, and is less than that reported in many preceding Congresses. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BURKETT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. Has the Government yet paid for the man who got killed?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What do you mean?

Mr. BURKETT. Was there ever any claim put in for that man's life?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why, no. He had been the attacking party.

Mr. BURKETT. And there has never been any claim filed?

Mr. PERKINS. Upon what theory do you consider that the Government should pay this expense?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The committee seem to have gone into that question in the report and cite a number of cases. I think the most analogous case I have been able to find of a claim of that kind is that which made an allowance in the case of Kilbourne. That was a case for false imprisonment, you may remember, and the House made an allowance in order to cover the loss and expense of the defense for the alleged false imprisonment.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ELEONORA G. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up Senate bill 3421, for the relief of Eleonora G. Goldsborough.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, instructed to pay to Eleonora G. Goldsborough, widow of the late Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough, of the Marine-Hospital Service, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, two years' pay at the rate of the salary he was receiving as surgeon at the time of his death, with allowances for two years.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the period after the word "death" and insert in lieu thereof a comma, and add after such comma the words "with allowances for two years, amounting in all to $7,200."

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SCHIRM. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the payment to Eleonora G. Goldsborough, widow of Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough, a surgeon of the Marine-Hospital Service, two years' salary, with allowances, amounting to $7,200. It appears that in 1888 Surgeon Goldsborough was performing an operation on a colored sailor, through which operation he contracted blood poisoning, which was the primary cause of his death. There is an affidavit here of R. P. M. Ames, late passed assistant surgeon of the Marine-Hospital Service, stating that he had attended Surgeon Goldsborough in November and December, 1889, and until his death on January 5, 1890.

There is a precedent for this claim, which is found in the Statutes at Large, volume 30, page 1460, being an act for the relief of the legal representatives of J. W. Branham, late assistant surgeon of the Marine-Hospital Service. It appears that Assistant Surgeon Branham had been in the service for about five months, and that his legal representatives were given a two years' salary with allowance, while the services of Surgeon Goldsborough extended over twelve years. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SCHIRM. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Does the widow of this surgeon draw a pension?

Mr. SCHIRM. She does not.

Mr. LACEY. Why not?

Mr. SCHIRM. Because pensions are not allowed to surgeons of the Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. LACEY. She does not have a pensionable status?

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I have looked through this report, and there is this distinction between the case that is reported in this bill and the case that the gentleman refers to, possibly twenty years ago. In that case the physician was in a pesthouse attending a yellow-fever patient. In this case the physician was not in a pesthouse. He was attending to his business as an assistant surgeon in the Army. There is that distinction between them. We did in that particular case, and so far this report shows that that is the only time we have ever paid a case of this sort, and this case is not on an equality with the case referred to in the report.

Mr. SCHIRM. Then the objection which the gentleman from Nebraska makes is this: That Assistant Surgeon Branham came to his death through service in a pesthouse, and Surgeon Goldsborough came to his death through an operation performed in a hospital upon a colored sailor in the line of his duty. I can not see where the distinction comes in.

Mr. BURKETT. In this case the report shows, as the letter from the wife of the deceased physician shows, that he contracted a cold in Chicago which led to his sickness and depleted his health to a great extent, and that he died as a result of blood poisoning.

Mr. SCHIRM. He died as the result of blood poisoning incurred in the line of his duty while performing an operation upon a sailor in a hospital.

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; but the letter shows——

Mr. SCHIRM. Let us have the letter read. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on this bill. The bill ought not to pass. I have taken occasion to read the report through, and I think before it passes the House the members of this House ought to know what is in it. There are legitimate claims against the Government, but here is a man that was appointed to a good position and every day of his service he had good appointments. He was placed in good places and he had a high salary, and, as I say, he was given very choice positions all along; he died in the service, and at that time was drawing a salary of $3,000 a year. Without any precedent except the one where the doctor had been sent into a pesthouse, we are going to establish a new precedent and give the widow of that doctor two years' full pay, or a little over that, together with the fees, which makes it $7,200. It is a bad precedent, Mr. Chairman, to establish. It is bound to create a good deal of dissatisfaction. The report shows that this woman has a farm worth $9,000 with some incumbrance on it.

Mr. SCHIRM. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURKETT. I will make my talk now, and then the gentleman can talk. The farm, she says, is worth $9,000, and she says there is an incumbrance of $6,000 upon it. She has some bank stock worth $1,300. Now, with that much of assets, as shown by the report, they are asking us here to set aside $7,200 for this woman. Mr. Chairman, I have a bill to-day asking a pension for a poor old soldier that is lying sick on his back, and because that man has a little home in which he lives, worth probably $2,000, under our rules we can not give that man, who served more than four years in the Army at $13 a month—you can not give him anything for his support and maintenance, when he is lying flat on his back and sick to-day.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, we are asked to give this woman $7,200, the widow of this man who drew from two to three thousand dollars a year for eleven or twelve years' service. I say it is not right. It is creating a bad precedent. Of course, it is a thing which she will appreciate, and it is something that the member of Congress who introduced the bill, representing her as a constituent, will appreciate, but it is not the thing for this House to do, and it is a precedent that the House ought not to establish.

If we can pay that woman under these conditions $7,200 a year, we had better pay some other widows in this country whose husbands served at $13 a month, and got paid off in money worth 40 cents on the dollar, and who saw harder work and greater anxiety and more vicissitudes than ever fell to the lot of this man. We can give it to those who showed more patriotism in the nation's dire distress in serving their country, and do it with more justice, as it seems to me, than to pass this sort of a bill. It seems to me, before this bill is passed, we ought to have this report read and see the exact conditions, Mr. Chairman, and I call for the reading of this report in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report in the time of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. SCHIRM), as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3421) granting two years' pay of her husband to Mrs. Eleonora G. Goldsborough, widow of the late Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough, of the Marine-Hospital Service, have given the same careful consideration and respectfully report that the facts are as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The memorial of Eleonora G. Goldsborough respectfully represents to your honorable body that she is the widow of Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough, late in the Marine-Hospital Service, and on behalf of herself and the minor children of the said Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough she respectfully prays that you will grant her the relief she asks for in her bill, to be paid to her; and for the purpose of informing your honorable body as to the facts upon which her bill is based she sets forth as follows:

(1) Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough was examined in accordance with law for admission into the service in August, 1877, and on October 3, 1877, was appointed an assistant surgeon in the Marine-Hospital Service.

He was first stationed in New York as assistant; was appointed in charge of the service in Norfolk, Va., and remained there two months; he was placed on special duty in Washington and Baltimore, and was assistant at New York for five months; he was nine months chief clerk in the city of Washington, and was then placed in charge of the service in the city of Baltimore, where he remained for three years, until April, 1882.

In October, 1880, he was promoted to the office of passed assistant surgeon while in charge of the Baltimore service. From Baltimore he was ordered to Mobile, where he remained in charge of the Marine-Hospital Service for three years and six months, until October 20, 1885, when he was ordered to Chicago, where he remained in charge of the service for two years and four months, until February 9, 1888.

While in Chicago he was promoted to the office of full surgeon October 1, 1886. From Chicago he was ordered to New Orleans, where he remained one year and eleven months, and died in the service January 5, 1890, leaving to survive him his widow, your petitioner, and two children, Charles Bloomfield, 9 years, and Irwin, 5 years of age.

(2) The entire estate left by your petitioner's husband amounted to $2,100, which was in the hands of a firm which has since failed, reducing his estate to nothing. Your petitioner's estate consists of a farm on the eastern shore of Maryland, valued at $9,000, but subject to a mortgage of $6,000, making its total net value $3,000, and shares of bank stock of the value of $1,300.

The net income from the farm, after paying the interest on the mortgage and all other charges and expenses incident to the same, when the crops are good is about $50, and the dividends derived from the bank stock amount to about $120, making the entire income received by your petitioner for the support of herself and her two children $170, which is liable to be decreased at any moment by the failure of the crops upon which the income from the farm depends.

(3) Your petitioner's husband, while engaged in the service of the Government, devoted himself with untiring energy to his duty, and he was constantly exposed not only to the danger of disease incident to his calling, but to the dangers arising by the constant change of climate, which in the course of his duty while under orders he was obliged to undergo, and his constitution was undoubtedly greatly undermined thereby.

While on duty in the city of Mobile he was desperately ill with malarial fever, and from there he was ordered to Chicago, the extreme cold of which, following upon the warmer temperature of Mobile, brought on a serious attack of rheumatism, from which he had not wholly recovered when he was again ordered to New Orleans. While engaged in the course of his duty he contracted blood poison in the performance of an operation, which also tended to undermine his health, and in April, 1889, he was again attacked by malarial fever, which his already weakened constitution was unable to withstand, and from which, together with the other complications, he eventually died.

(4) Your petitioner further represents that the compensation received by her husband and the frequent removals which in the course of his duty it became necessary for him to make rendered it impossible for him to save up more money than a portion of that which was left and which has been lost through no fault of your petitioner.

(5) Your petitioner has done and is doing all in her power to support herself and her children, and will continue to do so and will use all means in her power by her own exertions to increase the small income which she now receives.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

ELEONORA G. GOLDSBOROUGH.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned respectfully represent to your honorable body that they are personally cognizant of many of the facts stated in the foregoing memorial of Eleonora G. Goldsborough, and those of which they are not cognizant personally they believe to be therein stated truly. They further state that they believe the said Eleonora G. Goldsborough, the widow of Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough, and his two children are in great need of some support, and that the services of the late Dr. Charles B. Goldsborough entitle them to be paid a pension, and they are personally aware that she is using every honorable means to assist in the support of herself and her children.

JAS. SOMERS SMITH.
ANNA M. SMITH.
D. HAYES AGNEW.
W. DUBOIS MILLER.

(Since the date of the above memorial the farm and bank stock mentioned in section 2 have been disposed of at a sacrifice and the proceeds have been entirely expended in the support of the petitioner's family.)

The affidavits of Mrs. Goldsborough and Mrs. Annie E. Haverstick, in the possession of your committee, show that Surgeon Goldsborough contracted blood poisoning while operating on a negro sailor in the United States marine hospital.

In a letter from Surgeon Goldsborough to Dr. John B. Hamilton, the then Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, dated at Chicago, Ill., September 25, 1888, he states that he is suffering from carbuncles and is totally unfit for duty, his statement being substantiated by the accompanying certificate of Surg. H. W. Austin, of the Marine-Hospital Service, his attending physician.

That Surgeon Goldsborough suffered from the effects of blood poisoning, contracted as above stated, up to the time of his death is shown by the affidavit of Mrs. Goldsborough, and her statement is corroborated in part by the affidavit of Mrs. Haverstick, above referred to; and that his death was due primarily to the blood poisoning is proved by the affidavit of his attending physician at the time of his death, Dr. R. P. Ames, which is here set forth in full:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., March 7, 1902.

I hereby certify that I attended Surg. Charles B. Goldsborough in the marine hospital, New Orleans, in November and December, 1889, and until his death, January 5, 1890. His death was due primarily to "blood poisoning," as manifested by the formation of abscesses and carbuncles.

While not personally cognizant of the fact, as I was not stationed in New Orleans at the time, I have frequently heard that Surgeon Goldsborough had been poisoned while operating upon a negro sailor in the summer of 1888.

Very respectfully,

R. P. M. AMES,
Late Passed Assistant Surgeon, M. H. S.

Subscribed and sworn to this 7th day of March, 1902, before me.

FRANK E. CARPENTER,
Notary Public.

There can be no reasonable doubt that Surgeon Goldsborough's death was directly due to the effects of the operation in August, 1888.

It may be stated that a precedent for the bill now under consideration has been made by the act approved June 15, 1898, which granted the legal representatives of Asst. Surg. John W. Branham, of the Marine-Hospital Service, the amount of his salary and allowances for two years, Dr. Branham having died of yellow fever, after serving about five months. Surgeon Goldsborough gave faithful service for twelve years.

The Branham case was an exceptional one. This case comes in the same class and is considered equally exceptional.

Your committee are of the opinion that Dr. Goldsborough died of an infectious disease acquired in the performance of his duty, and the bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

In line 8 strike out the period after the word "death" and insert in lieu thereof a comma, and add after such comma the words "with allowances for two years, amounting in all to $7,200.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Chairman, I feel as if I ought to say a word in behalf of this bill.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PEARRE. It seems, Mr. Chairman, that my remarks are not necessary and I ask for a vote.

The amendment of the committee was considered and agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was then taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURKETT) there were—60 ayes and 29 noes.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

H. GLAFCKE.

Mr. GRAFF. I call up the bill (S. 3401) for the relief of H. Glafcke.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to H. Glafcke the sum of $110.39, being the balance due for necessary traveling expenses as deputy collector of internal revenue for the district of Colorado for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1900.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope that some explanation will be made of this bill.

Mr. GRAFF. This bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator Warren. It involves $110.39. It is to pay an amount due for traveling expenses of a deputy internal-revenue officer. It is recommended by Robert Williams, jr., Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a letter of March 2, 1902. Does the gentleman want any further explanation?

Mr. MONDELL. Let me state that the only necessity for this bill arose from the fact that this claim in the first instance, although presented in proper time, was not stated in the proper form, and before it was restated the time within which it could be regularly paid had elapsed.

Mr. GRAFF. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the amount allowed as expenses to a deputy internal-revenue officer is fixed by the collector of the district; that the annual allowance is divided into 12 monthly installments, and that the deputy can not, during any month, go beyond the allotment for that month. If the House is to adopt the precedent of paying expenses incurred by these officers beyond the amount allowed by the collector of the district, I shall be glad to know the fact, because a traveling deputy in the division in which I reside told me that last year he paid over $200 out of his own pocket, for expenses of this kind, above the allowance fixed by the collector of internal revenue for that district; so that if this bill should go through I will advise him when I return home to present his bill for reimbursement to the Committee on Claims, with the expectation that the claim will be paid. These expenses were incurred by him in the discharge of official duty on behalf of the Government, and I suppose the same rule would apply in his case as in this.

Mr. GRAFF. We will consider the case if it be presented to us, and will report favorably if the facts appear to warrant it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to call attention to that case now, in order that I may take advantage of the precedent here being set when I present the matter hereafter to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PAYNE (to Mr. CRUMPACKER). Why not introduce your bill now, refer it to the Committee on Claims, have it reported at once, and put right through here?

Mr. GRAFF. We will give full time to the consideration of the matter in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying this bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question was decided in the affirmative.

M'CLURE & WILLBANKS.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I call up the bill (H. R. 11340) for the relief of McClure & Willbanks.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to McClure & Willbanks, livery-stable keepers at Toccoa, Ga., $100, the value of a horse hired to internal-revenue officers and killed by illicit distillers in August, 1900.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I move that the bill be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, if I correctly caught the reading of this bill, there is enough on the very face of it to condemn it, even in this House and on this occasion. I do not see any more reason why the Government should pay for this horse than for any old horse that I might own.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. There was an officer——

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand, an officer of the Government had hired a horse from a livery stable, and while the man was engaged in taking possession of an illicit distillery the horse was killed. A terribly strong claim against the Government!

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. While the officer was in the discharge of his duty in breaking up this illicit distillery the moonshiners killed the horse.

Mr. PAYNE. Was the horse in the line of duty? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. He was; and I will say to the gentleman from New York that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Colonel Yerkes, thinks this a just claim and one which ought to be paid, and recommends payment.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not care what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or anybody else states about this question. It seems to me that no man who will reflect on the matter for a moment will think this a just claim. On the contrary, it is a perfectly outrageous claim for any man to present. Much less is it a proper claim for a committee of this House to bring in here or to be passed by even this Committee of the Whole. An officer of the Government hires a horse, drives it across country, somebody shoots the horse, and now we are asked to pay for it! Can any man imagine a more ridiculous claim against the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. TATE. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes; with pleasure.

Mr. TATE. The gentleman does not state correctly the facts of this case. This officer destroyed two illicit distilleries and seized a lot of whisky, which he took possession of for the Government. While this illicit whisky was being removed the livery-stable keepers' horse was shot in order to prevent the removal of the whisky by the officers of the Government. It does seem to me that the Government should pay this claim. It is the only way in which the owners can get pay for their horse.

Mr. KITCHIN moved that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—ayes 79, noes 10.

So the motion was agreed to.

C. W. COLEHOUR.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I next call up the bill (H. R. 7361) for the relief of C. W. Colehour.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to C. W. Colehour, his legal representatives or assigns, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,657.77 for sheltering and subsisting Eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain.

The following committee amendments were read:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "three thousand six hundred and fifty-seven dollars and seventy-seven cents," and insert in lieu thereof the words "one thousand and twenty dollars."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I hope we shall have some explanation of why this original claim was not paid in full, why the committee cut it down.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BOUTELL.

Mr. BOUTELL. I trust I shall be able to give the gentleman from New York full information on the subject.

Mr. PAYNE. I see that it is cut down two-thirds. I do not understand it.

Mr. BOUTELL. If the gentleman will move to put it back to the original amount, I will agree to vote for his amendment.

The favorable report in this case, Mr. Chairman, is based upon the statement of facts and the recommendations of the officials of the War Department, to whom this measure was referred. Their communications are contained in full in this report. The facts in brief are these: In February, 1899, Captain Wainwright, who was then stationed in Chicago, in charge of the mustering out of troops, advertised for bids for the subsistence and sheltering during mustering out of the Eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, lately returned from service in the war with Spain. The statement in the advertisement calls for sheltering and subsisting the troops from about March 1 to March 15.

The bid made by Mr. Colehour was accepted by Captain Wainwright, who telegraphed his decision to the War Department. The War Department urged him to have the work progress at once, and the building prepared for occupancy by March 1. Mr. Colehour rented a building known as Tattersalls, the only covered structure in the city which would contain the necessary number of men. On the very day that the United States Government agreed to have the troops there for mustering out, namely, on the 1st of March, 1899, Captain Wainwright informed the contractor that the transport had been delayed and that the troops would not arrive there until about the 15th of March, the day on which the contract under the specification was to expire.

As a matter of fact, the troops arrived on the 18th of March.

The mustering out consumed from March 18 to April 3, inclusive. The contractor was paid, under the advertisement, the sum of $4,732.80, and made his claim at once for the rental and other expenses connected with preparing the building for subsisting the troops during the period mentioned in the correspondence and contract. This claim was disallowed. The letter of Captain Wainwright sets forth the circumstances in the case, and the original claim of $3,700 covered not only the rental during the period from March 1 to March 18, but also covered the expenses which the contractor had been put to in providing the subsistence and the employees for feeding and caring for about 1,200 men. On referring the bill to the Quartermaster-General, General Ludington says:

It would seem that an allowance of $60 per day for seventeen days, or a total of $1,020, for this period from March 1 to March 17, inclusive, would reimburse the contractor for all expenses incurred so far as the Quartermaster's Department is concerned.

He therefore refused to recommend the payment of about $2,700 claimed by the contractor to have been incurred in other expenses in preparing the building and making preparations for sheltering and subsisting the troops. Under these circumstances the committee have recommended unanimously the passage of the bill with the amount fixed by the Quartermaster-General.

I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation, as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM J. SMITH AND D. M. WISDOM.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 111) for the relief of William J. Smith and D. M. Wisdom.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That William J. Smith and D. M. Wisdom be, and they are hereby, released from all liability incident to the forfeiture and judgment upon a certain bond in the penal sum of $3,000 with said William J. Smith and D. M. Wisdom as sureties, conditioned that R. M. Thompson appear at the term of the United States circuit court for the western district of Tennessee, begun on the fourth Monday in October, 1885.

SEC. 2. That all the right, title, and interest which the United States acquired from said William J. Smith by deed from the marshal of the United States for the western district of Tennessee of date February 20, 1888, in and to the following-described real estate: All the interest of William J. Smith in lot No. 1, in block No. 17, of Butler's addition to the city of Memphis, beginning on the corner of Echols and Elliott streets and running in a northerly direction along the west line of said Echols street 93½ feet; thence east to the west line of an alley, 352½ feet; thence south along the west line of said alley to the north line of Calhoun street, 196 feet; thence west along the north line of said Calhoun street to the west line of said Elliott street, 183 feet, and thence in a northwesterly direction along the north line of said Elliott street to the beginning, 206½ feet, be, and the same is hereby, divested from the United States, and all the said right, title, and interest be, and the same is hereby, vested in the said William J. Smith.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, of course from all that appears now every member of the Committee of the Whole would vote against this bill, because it appears that the Government has obtained a judgment on a bond and has seized some property and got title to it. Of course every man in the House would vote against it on that statement, on the bill itself. I think the gentleman ought to give some reason why the Government should give up this property.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this bill is for the relief of William J. Smith and D. M. Wisdom on a bail bond.

The facts are that one Robert M. Thompson was indicted in Memphis for a violation of the postal laws and was convicted. After his conviction Smith and Wisdom entered into a bond of $3,000 for his appearance. That bond originally was a void bond. Thompson absconded, and Smith employed detectives and went to considerable expense to locate him. He was arrested and brought through the District of Columbia, and here in Washington a habeas corpus proceeding was had, and Thompson was discharged upon the ground that the bond was void. Smith then caused Thompson to be arrested again and he was again discharged.

Now, the committee have certified copies of the record from the district court showing these facts, and Smith did all that he could to get Thompson back to answer to this judgment of the court. In the meantime Smith was the only solvent person on this bond. He is a man about 76 years of age, and this was practically all the property he had. His property was levied upon and struck off to the Government for $3,209.36, being the amount of the bond and the costs. Now, I am in possession of a letter from H. M. Hoyt, Acting Attorney-General, in which he says:

This case seems to be one demanding relief, but I think it is one that should be relieved by act of Congress.

This bill passed the House ten years ago and once passed the Senate. How it has never become a law I can not explain, but it has passed this House, I think, on two occasions.

Mr. PERKINS. What has become of this property that was levied on?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. It was struck off to the United States.

Mr. BURKETT. Why should this bondsman be relieved? That is the point of the whole matter.

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I have been trying to explain that. The bondsman should be relieved simply because the bond has been declared by the courts here to be void. This bondsman went to the expense of rearresting this man, who was discharged in the courts of the District of Columbia upon the ground that the bond was void.

Mr. DALZELL. On what ground was it held void?

Mr. BURKETT. How did the man come to be discharged?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. On the ground that the bond was given after the judgment of the court. The man was found guilty, and it was a curious bond for the court to take in the first place.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I should like to inquire of the gentleman how the Government managed to get a judgment on a void bond?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I can not explain that.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the Government get judgment on the bond before he had arrested the man?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. No; I think he went to work immediately—that is my present recollection about the case—to obtain his arrest.

Mr. PAYNE. Why did he not plead that the bond was void?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. I can not give you an explanation of that. Anyhow, the judgment stands against him; and those are the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. But he did arrest the man and tried to surrender him to the Government?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Yes; and spent large sums of money in the endeavor to do so.

Mr. PAYNE. And the man was finally released by the court on the ground that the bond was void?

Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee. Yes.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH W. PARISH.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up Calendar No. 1581, being Senate bill 475, to refer the claim of Joseph W. Parish to the Secretary of the Treasury for examination and payment of any balance found due.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make full and complete examination into the claim of Joseph W. Parish against the United States for balance alleged to be due him by virtue of a contract made by J. W. Parish & Co. with Henry Johnson, a medical storekeeper, acting on behalf of the United States, which contract bears date March 5, 1863, and provides that said J. W. Parish & Co. should furnish to the United States for the use of the Medical Department of the Army the whole amount of ice required to be consumed at Memphis and Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo., and Cairo, Ill., during the remainder of the said year 1863; that the Secretary shall determine and ascertain the full amount which should have been paid said J. W. Parish & Co. if the said contract had been carried out in full, without change or default made by either of the parties thereto, under the rule of the measure of damages laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The United States against Behan (110 U. S. Reports, p. 338), and in accordance with the evidence in the case collected by the United States Court of Claims, and after determining the full amount thus due said J. W. Parish & Co., under the said contract and rule of law aforesaid, to deduct therefrom all payments which have been made to said J. W. Parish & Co., or to said Joseph W. Parish, whether in pursuance of judgments of the court or direct appropriation by Congress, or otherwise, stating what balance, if any, is due under the rule and evidence prescribed herein, and pay the said balance to said Joseph W. Parish, the present owner of said claim; and sufficient money to pay such balance is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury which has not been otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GRAFF. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. I trust the gentleman will give the committee a little light on the subject of this bill, or I will ask to have the report read.

Mr. GRAFF. The facts in this case are that Joseph W. Parish and a man by the name of Huse, under the firm name of J. W. Parish & Co., in 1863 entered into a written contract with the Government to deliver ice, as was required by the Government in that year. That year—the winter of 1863 and 1864—there was no ice which could be procured south of Chicago. It had to be procured in Canada and from the St. Lawrence River. After the contract was made Huse withdrew from the contract, and Parish was the only one who was interested in the contract, and he became responsible for the terms of it.

The assistant surgeon at St. Louis issued an order under the terms of the contract for 30,000 tons of ice, to be delivered at four different places within twenty days—at Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo., and Cairo, Ill.—specifying the amount of the 30,000 tons to be delivered at each of the four places. After the order was given by the assistant surgeon of the Army stationed at St. Louis to deliver this 30,000 tons of ice, Mr. Parish, the claimant, immediately went North to purchase the ice. He purchased 30,000 tons of ice and notified the Government that he had it and was ready to deliver.

As a matter of fact, the Government, only took 12,000 and some odd tons, leaving 18,000 uncalled for; and issued an order suspending the previous order for the 30,000 tons of ice. The 12,000 tons were delivered, and there is no question about that, at the contract price. The price of ice per ton was fixed in the contract. The ice, however, remained at the different places that he had stationed it after the purchase. Ice, you know, is a perishable commodity. He could have sold the ice as high as $50 a ton during that summer. He held the ice for the purpose of filling his contract with the Goverment. He had the ice within the time required, within the twenty days, and there is no question about that.

All these facts were shown when he came to prosecute his claim before the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims, however, decided that he had no right to recover upon his contract, because, as they alleged, the assistant surgeon had no legal authority to bind the United States by ordering the 30,000 tons of ice. But, however, the Court of Claims made their findings of fact covering the whole scope of the case. Their decision against him rested upon the theory that the assistant surgeon who ordered the ice had no legal authority to bind the Government. The case, therefore, went to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision of the Court of Claims, and decided that the assistant surgeon, who had ordered the 30,000 tons of ice, was able, from a legal standpoint, to bind the Government, and in fact he did bind the Government; and hence there remained nothing for the Supreme Court to do but find out on what terms his damages should be based, and how much they were.

The Supreme Court in their decision said that the difficulty about the case was that Mr. Parish was "not ready and willing," in the language of the old pleadings, to deliver the ice. They said that in the face of the fact that there was a finding in the Court of Claims below, in the following language, taken from the Twelfth Court of Claims Report, 609 to 617:

IX. The said Parish was prepared and willing to deliver the said 30,000 tons of ice, in conformity with the conditions and obligations of his said contract and the terms of said letter of March 25, 1863—

That is the letter of the assistant surgeon ordering the ice—of which the defendant had notice, but they would not nor did receive more than the 12,762 tons aforesaid.

So that the finding of the Supreme Court was in direct contravention of the findings of fact in the court below, and they therefore allowed him——

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman which he thinks the higher of the decisions—the Supreme Court or the Court of Claims?

Mr. GRAFF. If the gentleman will allow me to finish my argument, the Supreme Court, under its rule and practice, does not go behind, and says it will not go behind, the evidence for the purpose of weighing the evidence upon which any finding of fact is based by the Court of Claims. The court accepts the findings of fact of the Court of Claims in all cases as conclusive to them.

The Supreme Court therefore overlooked in the case the finding of fact which said that Mr. Parish was ready and willing to deliver the ice and that the Government had not and did not take any of it except the 12,000 tons to which I have alluded; and, basing their conclusion upon the fact that no such finding did exist in the findings of the Court of Claims, they took it as a measure of damages and allowed him only the cost of the ice, and he received that amount, which amounted to $64,000. This was away back in 1879, a period of fifteen or sixteen years after the war was closed.

The report is full of testimony showing that Mr. Parish was a man of patriotic character in the conflict; showing that he did what not many were willing at this time, in 1863, to do, to assume the obligation of delivering ice and supplies of that kind in those times of uncertainty to the Government. This ice thereafter melted upon his hands, and he received only the absolute amount which he paid. This probably is the only claimant who is interested in any case upon this Calendar whom I personally know. He has now reached the age of 76 years; he is a poor man; he was a man well to do in the times of 1863. He put all the money he possessed, his entire fortune, into the purchase of that ice, which was allowed to melt on the shores of the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers, and the Government has compelled him to wait all these years even for the purpose of returning the actual dollars which he had invested in this contract under the Government.

You are in the position of the Irishman when he said that the horse was 18 feet high and it was questioned. The horse was brought in, and it was insisted that there was the horse and he was only 18 hands high. The Irishman said, "Did I say 18 feet high?" "Yes." He looked at the horse and he said, "I stick to it." [Laughter.] Now, then, if that is the proposition, that a citizen of the United States has no relief before this Congress, after having invested all his funds and money and waited for a period of twenty years to receive the amount he risked and put into the contract, I say that Congress can not be any too ready to pay this man the correct measure of damages which was allowed.

Now, in 110 Supreme Court Decisions of the United States, eleven volumes after the volume in which was contained the Parish case, the Supreme Court laid down the proper measure of damages, and they say that where the question of profit is one that can not be easily ascertained, where it is speculative, then there can be some question about allowing the party who is injured by a breach of contract to receive the profit in addition to the amount he invested. But where the price of the ice is fixed in the contract itself, by the United States Government, where this man had invested his money in this perishable property when he went up into Canada and along the St. Lawrence River at three points and purchased ice for the use of the Army and in the hospital, at a particular time when the Government was fully warranted in believing that they would need all this vast quantity of ice along these three or four towns on the Mississippi River, around which clustered so many of the activities of the war, I say this is a case which is absolutely correct.

Now, what does this bill seek to do? The bill does not seek to have this Congress figure up the amount that is due this claimant, but the bill is drawn referring this claim to the Treasury Department and asking them to award this man the amount that is due him, not under any arbitary direction, but under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Beham, case in the one hundred and tenth volume, to which I have alluded.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, we have a perfect right to have this claim explained, and if it takes five minutes it is a good deal shorter than compelling those who want information to resort to dilatory proceedings.

Mr. GRAFF. I am perfectly willing to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. PERKINS. I know the gentleman is. I think we have a right to ask the question, because this claim amounts to $80,000. What was the price set in the contract with the Government?

Mr. GRAFF. The price stated was different at different places. Of course, it would be so, because it was more costly to deliver the ice at one point on the river than it would be on the other; but I will say to the gentleman that my information is that the average price of the ice along the river delivered at that time cost $18 a ton.

Mr. PERKINS. What did the Government agree to pay?

Mr. GRAFF. The contract price.

Mr. PERKINS. What was the price stated in the contract?

Mr. GRAFF. That was the price agreed upon.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask my friend another question. As I understand his statement, it is that the Supreme Court of the United States, a tribunal of some learning, fell into manifest error as to the facts found by the Court of Claims?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, it is manifest; there can be no question about that.

Mr. PERKINS. Why was it that the counsel did not move for a reargument? He must have been a most extraordinary counsel.

Mr. GRAFF. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. Mr. Parish had as counsel a man by the name of Merriam. Parish himself was not a lawyer, and he would not have any knowledge of what was the proper measure of damages, as we can all understand. Mr. Merriam was a man somewhat advanced in years, and he went off into the New England States at the time this case was decided, and soon after died. Mr. Parish did not know what his rights were until it was too late for him to take advantage of a motion for a new hearing.

Mr. PERKINS. He must have had very extraordinary counsel.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am a little inquisitive myself about this case, and I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. GRAFF. I am willing to answer any questions.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to say that the court allowed the claimant $64,000?

Mr. GRAFF. No, that is not quite true; the court did not fix any amount, but it sent it back to the Court of Claims for construction.

Mr. PAYNE. How much did the Court of Claims allow?

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Parish received two allowances; he received one, $10,000, at first in the Court of Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. For the 18,000 tons?

Mr. GRAFF. He only received a very small amount, only $10,000. The reason was this: When he tried the case before the Court of Claims he tried it upon the theory that he was entitled to the contract price, and there was no evidence, or very slight evidence, if indeed any—it was merely accidental—bearing upon the question, because it was not anticipated that that was a contested point in the case. If he was entitled to the contract price, the question what he had paid for the ice, which he had gathered in various parts and from various sources, had nothing to do with the subject of the trial, basing his claim as he did upon the contract price.

Mr. PAYNE. How much did he receive in all?

Mr. GRAFF. He received altogether $64,000.

Mr. PAYNE. How much for the 12,000 tons?

Mr. GRAFF. He was paid for that the contract price; there is no question about that.

Mr. PAYNE. Then he received $216,000 for 12,000 tons. How much for the 18,000 tons?

Mr. GRAFF. I can not tell about that. I can only say that he received the cost price of the ice.

Mr. PAYNE. Then he received about $3.50 a ton for those 18,000 tons?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Then he received $272,000 for the 30,000 tons, which cost him about $100,000.

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, no; I am informed—and I have taken some trouble to look into the case—I am informed that the amount to which he will be entitled will be about $80,000.

Mr. PAYNE. But he received $216,000——

Mr. GRAFF. Whatever he received will be deducted.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, no; for the 12,000 tons I understand he was paid the contract price—$18 a ton.

Mr. GRAFF. I suppose that is so.

Mr. PAYNE. That would be $216,000.

Mr. GRAFF. As I said, the price of the ice varied at different points.

Mr. PAYNE. But he received $212,000 for the 12,000 tons; and he received in addition $64,000, making an aggregate of about $280,000. The 30,000 tons cost him $105,000. So that he is doing pretty well. He did not fail or lose his property on account of this contract. While he was patriotic, he was patriotic "with a string to it."

Mr. GRAFF. I think there is some question, perhaps, about his having received the contract price for that first lot of ice, until he tried his case.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to say that he did receive it.

Mr. GRAFF. I suppose he did, but I am not certain about it.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no claim here for that.

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNE. There certainly would have been if he had not received it.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not see what bearing that has an the case.

Mr. PAYNE. No; I suppose the gentleman can not see it.

Mr. GRAFF. We are simply asking that this man be paid what the Government promised to pay him, he having rendered all the service and done everything that he was required to do by the terms of the contract. He was in default in no respect.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, the gentleman says that. But I suppose the Supreme Court of the United States would have the right to say that he had not tendered that ice, if on an examination of the evidence it found there was no testimony to show it. In point of fact, the case does not show it.

Mr. GRAFF. But the court does not do that.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know whether it does or not. There is no evidence of that fact. They would have the right so to decide, and probably would so decide under the circumstances. Probably the attorney on the part of the Government would present that fact. But even if there were no evidence showing that this ice had not been tendered, I presume if the gentleman had gone a little further he might have found that fact.

Mr. GRAFF. I think I have gone through the case pretty thoroughly.

The question being taken, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

It was decided in the affirmative.

WILLIAM M. BIRD AND OTHERS.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I call up the bill (H. R. 2441) for the relief of William M. Bird, James F. Redding, Henry F. Welch, and others.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to examine into the circumstances of the performance and execution by William M. Bird, James F. Redding, Henry F. Welch, and others, as sureties of D. A. J. Sullivan, of the work in the construction of the new United States post-office and court-house in Charleston, S. C., under the contract of the said D. A. J. Sullivan to construct the same, dated January 13, 1890, and ascertain what work was done thereunder, and whether for any reason the said parties who performed said work are justly and equitably entitled to be reimbursed the amount by them expended in performing said work over and above the original contract price; and the said Secretary is authorized to take evidence to ascertain the facts in the case, notwithstanding the terms of the contract, and to determine the amount that should fairly and equitably be allowed said parties, and to pay such sum as he may determine shall be allowed, not to exceed, however, the sum of $25,000. And a sufficient amount of money is hereby appropriated, out of the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the amount so found to be fairly and equitably due, not exceeding the sum of $25,000.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out from line 6, page 2, the words "twenty-five thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-two thousand seven hundred and four."

Also, strike out from line 10, page 2, the words "twenty-five thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-two thousand seven hundred and four."

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has read the report in this case, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not recollect anything of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Well, I move that the bill be laid aside for favorable report.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not press that motion at once. I should like to have the report read in my time, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] to make a brief statement.

Mr. PAYNE. Although I have a right to the floor, I am not going to insist upon it, and I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] is recognized.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I should have been quite content to have the report read without any further explanation, for I am sure that the gentleman from New York on hearing the report would have had no objection to the bill.

This bill is for the relief of the sureties of Daniel A. J. Sullivan, who, in about 1890, became a contractor for building the superstructure of the Charleston post-office. The claim arises from the various acts of the Government officials which imposed great hardships, delay, and damage on the contractor. The history of the matter is as follows: Mr. Sullivan was, first of all, delayed sixteen months in commencing his contract because of the supposed necessity to have taken up some of the work upon the foundation of the building, with which Mr. Sullivan had nothing to do. That was the first trouble he encountered.

That delay, first of all, brought him under the operation of the eight-hour law, very much to his injury. After he was allowed to go to work he was persecuted and subjected to all manner of improper and illegal demands, both by the superintendent in charge of the building and by his foreman, Mr. Caulfield. Sullivan protested time and again to the authorities at Washington, and he gave notice that he was forced by the superintendent to put upon the building a greatly superior class of work than his contract called for. He gave the authorities notice that, being under duress in consequence of the authority of the superintendent over him, he would make claim against the Government for the value of all such work. The Government sent down to Charleston several inspectors for the purpose of ascertaining the facts with reference to these many differences between the superintendent and foreman and the contractor.

At first they gave not very much attention to Sullivan's complaints, but finally it was ascertained that what he had complained of was true, and to an extent that the gentlemen of this committee would hardly believe possible on the part of a Government official. As a result of those reports, Mr. Caulfield, the foreman, was first discharged; but the troubles continued, and the Secretary of the Treasury finally found it necessary, in the interests of justice, and decency even, to discharge the superintendent. The whole trouble arose out of the fact that General Stolbrand was a foreigner and not accustomed to American ways. As an instance of that, one of the Government inspectors reports that when the Government inspector, being on the spot, required some things to be examined into, Stolbrand said that he would have nothing to do with it, because the mortar with which the material was laid was mixed according to American methods and not according to those prevailing in the Kingdom of Denmark, of which he was a native.

The same inspector says further that, upon his making a very proper and reasonable suggestion as to some matter, he was overwhelmed by a great amount of invective and abuse and threats of official decapitation. Now, I have not time to go into all of this, but the result of it was that Mr. Sullivan became insolvent about the time that Stolbrand was discharged as superintendent, and very soon afterwards died. His sureties, these gentlemen for whose relief this bill is introduced, took up the completion of the contract. The inspectors report them to be gentlemen of the highest honor and integrity, and among the leading citizens of Charleston. They went to work in a systematic and business-like way, making a thorough organization to complete the building. These sureties paid out in completing that contract over $44,000 more than had been received from the Government on account of the contract, not one dollar of which has ever been repaid them.

Now, this bill is not for damages against the Government. There is no element of that sort in it. It is simply that the Government shall pay to these sureties the amount which the Government has been bettered by this improved character of work. The testimony is all here. It is of a very technical character, and it is impossible in the limited time to place it before the members of the committee, as would be proper if the matter were now up for full investigation. The object of the bill is to refer it to the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain what in justice and fairness and equity should be paid to these gentlemen. There is not one dollar claimed except what the Secretary of the Treasury may find to be derived by the Government from its having received a superior class of work upon the building. That is the whole case, and I think, under the circumstances, no definite sum being appropriated, it all being left to the Secretary of the Treasury, in whom, of course, we all have perfect confidence, and from the further fact that these examinations have been made and show upon their face the merits of the case, though of course they were not as full and complete as the Secretary will hereafter make, that the bill should become a law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question or two for information?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. From my understanding of the bill, as it was read by the Clerk, I got the impression that it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to open up the whole situation and ascertain what the public building is fairly and equitably worth.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And to pay that amount without regard to the terms fixed by the contract.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Not exceeding some $22,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not exceeding $22,000. So that if the original contractor had by error of judgment agreed in the competitive bidding to construct the building for an inadequate sum, the Secretary of the Treasury would be allowed to make up for the discrepancy under the terms of this bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT. No. The point is that he was required by the Government superintendent to do work of a character far superior to what the contract required him to do. He complained of it time and again and gave notice that he would hold the Government responsible. The claim is only for the betterment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no disposition to oppose this bill if it is properly safeguarded, provided it does not contain that feature.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. It does not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It occurred to me that if the contractor for a public building in competitive bidding fixes his figures, and gives bond for the faithful execution of the work, and it shall afterwards turn out that his bid was for too small a sum, if he is to be allowed to come in afterwards and recover from the Government what he probably lost under the terms of the contract, it is a very bad precedent.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is not involved.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The point is——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg to say that from the reading of the bill I got that understanding of it. Of course I understand that embarrassments come through the fault, sometimes, of Government officers, from visiting architects, and this and that, and as a rule I think contractors add about 20 per cent to the normal cost of Government buildings to provide against such contingencies. As a rule it costs the Government 20 to 25 per cent more to construct a building than it does for private individuals, and it ought to cost that much more, I think, in view of the character of the inspection.

Mr. LATIMER. If the gentleman will just yield for a moment I think I can answer the gentleman from Indiana. This is for a better class of brick than was required in the contract, that were put in by these sureties.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that all right enough, but my understanding of the bill is that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to ascertain what the building would cost, what it is fairly and equitably worth, without regard to the terms of the contract. Now, there may be some parts of the building that were not interferred with, and the contractor's bid may have been too low. Yet it will be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to add to the terms of the contract whatever ought to have been added by the prudent judgment of the contractor when he put in his bid.

Mr. LATIMER. As I understand it, it is simply to pay for betterments over and above the contract.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The bill provides for more than that.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. It says that it shall not exceed the amount which the Government inspector says was put into betterments.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It opens up that question and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse the contractor for a bad bargain that he made with the Government.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. But not to exceed $22,000, which is the amount the Government inspector said was put in extra for bricks, even, over and above the contract.

Mr. LATIMER. For mortar and brick.

Mr. PAYNE. Why do you not amend your bill and put it in for the extras required by the Government?

Mr. LATIMER. That is exactly what is put in, on the report of the Government inspector.

Mr. PAYNE. It is incomprehensible how any Government inspector went to work and required more than the contract required. I never came across one that would hold the contractor up to his contract.

Mr. LATIMER. The inspector sent there by the Treasury Department reported that the betterments amount to this sum.

Mr. PAYNE. The Treasury Department is to pay what the building would equitably cost in the way it was built, deducting from that the sum that was paid.

Mr. LATIMER. Not at all.

Mr. PAYNE. I gathered that from the remarks of my friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. I have not read the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will excuse me a moment——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This is a short bill, and I will read it, and we can determine the question then:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to examine into the circumstances of the performance and execution by William M. Bird, James F. Redding, Henry F. Welch, and others, as sureties of D. A. J. Sullivan, of the work in the construction of the new United States post-office and court-house in Charleston, S. C., under the contract of the said D. A. J. Sullivan to construct the same, dated January 13, 1890, and ascertain what work was done thereunder, and whether for any reason the said parties who performed said work are justly and equitably entitled to be reimbursed the amount by them expended in performing said work over and above the original contract price.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is the point.

Mr. FINLEY. That is, under the contract.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (reading):

And the said Secretary is authorized to take evidence to ascertain the facts in the case, notwithstanding the terms of the contract, and to determine the amount that should fairly and equitably be allowed said parties, and to pay such sum as he may determine shall be allowed, not to exceed, however, the sum of $22,704. And a sufficient amount of money is hereby appropriated, out of the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the amount so found to be fairly and equitably due, not exceeding the sum of $22,704.

Mr. LATIMER. It is over and above the contract.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does not say over and above the contract.

To perform such work is justly entitled to be reimbursed the amount they have expended in performing the work over and above.

Suppose the original contract was too small, it was inadequate, and they equitably had to expend an amount necessary to carry on the contract. The question I had in mind was whether it would not open up that question.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZABETH MUHLEMAN.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill S. 2216.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2216) for the relief of Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and the heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Elizabeth Muhleman, widow, and the heirs at law of Samuel A. Muhleman, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the death of said Samuel A. Muhleman on February 14, 1898, caused by injury received on the 9th day of June, 1893, while employed as a clerk in the Record and Pension Office, War Department, while located in Ford's Theater at the time of its collapse.

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this bill, that has already passed the Senate, proposes to appropriate the sum of $5,000 for the benefit of the heirs of Samuel A. Muhleman, who received injuries at the time of the collapse of the Ford Theater in this city, from which injuries the evidence conclusively shows that he afterwards died. A commission was appointed after this disaster occurred for the purpose of examining into the cases of injury, and that commission fixed the amount of damages to the heirs of parties who were killed in the accident at $5,000. This commission fixed the sum of $5,000 as the amount of damages to be awarded in this class of cases, and that rule has been adopted in all cases of death caused by this accident. This is the last of these claims, so far as the Committee on Claims is advised. It is proposed by this bill to pay the heirs of Mr. Muhleman the same sum as damages as was paid to the heirs of the other parties who were killed outright in the disaster. I therefore move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. How many commissions have there been to fix the amount of damages on account of injuries received at the Ford Theater? How often has the time been extended and how many commissions have there been? Is the gentleman able to state?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. PAYNE. Did this party, who is deceased, living at the time of these commissions, ever present a claim to the commission for that injury?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I am not advised that he ever presented a claim to the commission. In fact, I understand that he did not present any claim to the commission.

Mr. PAYNE. Then he did not find out in his lifetime that he was injured there?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Oh, yes; the testimony of the physicians, which appears in the report, shows that he complained of injuries from the time of the accident up to the time of his death. The testimony of the physicians who attended him during this time clearly establishes that fact; and that afterwards they were the cause of his death.

Mr. PAYNE. What was the nature of the injury that caused the death?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. The cause of death, as the result of the injuries, was heart trouble. This disease continued to increase in severity from the time of the injury until it eventually resulted in his death.

Mr. PAYNE. How long after that injury was it that he died of heart trouble?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. He died in 1898.

Mr. PAYNE. And the injury was when? I have forgotten the date of the accident.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Nearly five years before.

Mr. PAYNE. Five years after the injuries he died. You are positive he did not present any claim to the Commission?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. I am not advised that he did.

Mr. GRAFF. No, I think not.

Mr. PAYNE. He did not get any award from the Commission?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. There is no question about that.

Mr. PAYNE. What evidence is there of the man having heart trouble five years before he died, and the effect of the injury?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. We have the testimony of the physicians who treated him before and during this entire time, and who treated him up to his death. This evidence we have.

Mr. PAYNE. And he testifies that this disability came from the accident?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Who is this doctor?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Thomas Hynes, Fred K. Swett, James T. Hensey, D. H. Riggs, R. B. Johnstone.

Mr. PAYNE. He did not have all those doctors?

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa (continuing). G. Howard Kennard and E. A. Wehrman.

Mr. PAYNE. Did he have all those doctors?

Mr. DOVENER. He was treated by all of them.

Mr. PAYNE. He was treated by all of them?

Mr. DOVENER. Trying to cure him.

Mr. PAYNE. No wonder that he died of heart trouble.

Mr. DOVENER. The evidence showed that he did not have heart trouble before the injury and that accident caused it.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I must confess that my sympathies were aroused—and I am as hard-hearted as the gentleman from New York, probably—with the story that Mrs. Muhleman told me in regard to the matter. The whole West Virginia delegation are interested in this claim. Mrs. Muhleman is a woman of high character. She has an unfortunate daughter who is consumptive. The boy is in the schools here, with only one arm, and the family is now supported through the work of one daughter, a young lady of about 21 or 22 years of age, and while that has nothing to do with the legal aspect of the case, it had a great deal to do with eliciting my interest in securing its consideration.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a presumption of law that after the injury has occurred and a year and a day has elapsed that he died from some other cause?

Mr. GRAFF. That might be a prima facie presumption, but not an absolute fact. It would not bar medical testimony from establishing directly that there was a connection between the trouble and the death.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But it changes the burden of proof.

Mr. GRAFF. So far as the Government liability is concerned for the disaster itself, that matter is already covered and has been determined.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, if the condition of this family had been presented to me, and I had heard of the trouble of the family—the consumption of the daughter and the loss of the arm of the son—and the hard road they had to travel to get along, I should have felt very much like putting my hand into my pocket and trying to help them out.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. How much will the gentleman give now? [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; how much will the gentleman contribute?

Mr. PAYNE. I will give as much as the gentleman from Iowa will. Now, as I say, I should be tempted to do that. If I was convinced of that fact, I should feel like contributing to help them, but I should not feel like putting my hand into the Treasury of the United States and paying this sum out of sympathy.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. It is not out of sympathy, but where there is a just claim to back it up it seems to me that this is right.

Mr. PAYNE. Sympathy is the ground the chairman put it on. Now, we have had two commissions and we have invited everybody to come in before the commission, and every time the report has come in we have been assured that this was the last claim. We have advertised for claims through the papers, and the last person who imagined he had a claim came in here. Now, after the decease of this gentleman from heart disease, or doctors, or something else, the claim comes in here, the full claim of $5,000, for the death of this person. I do not think we ought to pay it. I would be willing to take up a subscription if the statement about the family is well authenticated, but I should want the committee to acquire more evidence than they usually do; but I do not feel, for one, like putting my hand into the Treasury of the United States and paying out Government money for this purpose.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3354. An act for the relief of G. W. Ratleff;

G. H. SOWDER.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 1928) for the relief of G. H. Sowder.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the Treasury of the United States, of any money not otherwise appropriated, to G. H. Sowder, of Pineville, Bell County, Ky., administrator of the estate of B. H. Sowder, deceased, failing mail contractor, the sum of $567.77, the amount due to the estate of B. H. Sowder, as shown by the records of the Auditor's Office for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. PAYNE. I trust the gentleman will give us some explanation of this bill.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. This is another of the mail carriers, found to be due on the settlement with the Department before the war. This is not one of the Confederate veterans, either.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, if we are to spend the time on these claims which I am satisfied were paid by the Confederate Government, I think we might as well go into some other business. On this claim I think I better have read some pages of the RECORD from the Forty-fifth Congress, where the arguments are set out more cogently than perhaps I can set them out.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. This claimant was not included with those who presented their claims in the Forty-sixth Congress. He was not in the Confederate States. A letter of the Secretary of the Treasury admits that this amount is due and to his credit there now. A similar bill has been introduced in several Congresses, but never could be reached, and I would say to the gentleman from New York that this man was a Union soldier.

Mr. PAYNE. Now the gentleman has changed the status of his claim by saying it was not one of the Confederate States, and therefore could not have been paid by the Confederate Government, although he assured me in the first instance that it was another one of those claims.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. The gentleman misunderstood me. I referred to it as an ante-bellum mail claim.

Mr. PAYNE. I supposed it was one from the Confederate States.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. No; it was from Kentucky.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

L. A. NOYES.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 3546) for the relief of L. A. Noyes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,819 to L. A. Noyes, for services rendered as acting assistant Treasury agent at the island of St. George, Alaska, from August 1, 1886, to May 30, 1887, inclusive.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman state the character of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, in 1886, in President Cleveland's Administration, Mr. George R. Tingle, special Treasury agent in charge of the Pribilof Islands, Alaska, had permission to return to Washington and was instructed to leave two of his three assistants at the islands during the winter, one in charge of the island of St. Paul and the other in charge of the island of St. George. The three assistants were T. F. Ryan, A. P. Loud, and J. P. Manchester, the two latter having gone up to the islands at the opening of the season, twice the force being required in the summer as in the winter.

Mr. Tingle and Mr. Ryan, having spent the previous winter on the islands, were, in accordance with custom and the written permission of the Secretary of the Treasury, granted leave to return to the States, and Captain Loud relieved Mr. Tingle at St. Paul Island, according to expectation; but Mr. Manchester, who was expected to relieve Mr. Ryan at St. George, had a verbal understanding with Assistant Secretary Smith before he left Washington, that on account of the illness of his wife he, too, if he chose, at the close of the sealing season, might return home, which he decided to do, thus leaving St. George without a Government officer.

Mr. Tingle knew that this would not answer, as valuable property interests were at stake, and he accordingly applied to Mr. L. A. Noyes to take charge of St. George Island for the winter. From an examination of the records of his office he found that in a similar emergency in 1870 Captain Bryant, the Treasury agent in charge, had appointed a Mr. Falconer to fill a vacancy, and that the Secretary subsequently ratified the appointment, and permitted Mr. Falconer to be paid without objection. In this instance, however, the Treasury Department held that as this assistant, Mr. Manchester, had not formally tendered his resignation, there was no actual vacancy, and that therefore the agent had no authority to appoint Mr. Noyes. Mr. Noyes consented reluctantly to remain there during the winter, and he did remain there. The Treasury Department finds that he rendered valuable and necessary services, and recommends the payment of this amount by Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. The man who appointed him got his own salary, I suppose?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont.. No; he returned home, so that he had no salary.

Mr. PAYNE. Are you sure about that?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I take it to be the fact, because the Government of the United States is not accustomed to pay officials except when on duty.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, the gentleman is not acquainted with the Government of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I know I am not as well as the gentleman from New York, but I hope to be.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope so.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not see that that has anything to do with the case if the Government saw fit to let this official come home and let this other man render the service.

Mr. PAYNE. It has simply this to do with it: This officer of the United States wants to go home, so he jumps his job and leaves somebody in charge of it, and then he comes in and wants the Government to pay somebody else as well as himself.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. That is not this case at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, then, he has been paid; of course it would be a violent presumption to suppose he had not been paid.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The gentleman does not understand the case at all. This agent who returned home was authorized by the Department to leave two assistants there, whether he remained there or not. Both of those assistants returned home, however, and the third one, who was expected to remain there and take the place which Mr. Noyes filled, had a verbal understanding with the Secretary of the Treasury that he might also return home, and he did return home, and from that time he drew nothing from the Government. Mr. Noyes took his place, and all we ask is that Mr. Noyes have the compensation that the assistant would have had if he had not returned home.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not the gentleman say a moment ago that the Treasury Department did not appoint this man because the places were filled by these other assistants?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Let me explain.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not the gentleman say that?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. No; the gentleman from New York did not understand me. I will explain what I said.

Mr. Manchester, who was expected to relieve Mr. Ryan, and who held this place which Mr. Noyes filled, stated that he had a verbal understanding with the Secretary by which he could return home. The Treasury Department held that, because he did not send in his resignation before he returned home, there was in reality no vacancy, and that, therefore, Mr. Tingle could not legally make the appointment. If Mr. Manchester had reached Washington and had handed in his resignation before the appointment of Mr. Noyes, then, in accordance with the case of Captain Bryant in 1870, the Treasury Department would not have raised the question at all, but would promptly have paid Mr. Noyes his salary.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I was right about it. When Mr. Noyes took charge there, there was a full corps of assistants drawing their pay.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. No; not drawing their pay.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Manchester had ceased to draw pay. Their pay was simply $6 a day when on duty.

Mr. PAYNE. And he was on duty until he reported to Washington. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. GRAFF. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MAJ. WILLIAM KENDALL.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I call up the bill (H. R. 7007) for the relief of the legal representatives of Maj. William Kendall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to settle the account of William Kendall, deceased, as a sutler at Fort Columbus, New York Harbor, for articles furnished by him to soldiers there recruited or stationed during the period from the 1st day of January, 1867, to the 31st day of December, 1868, inclusive.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where the several amounts claimed were regularly entered on the original muster of descriptive rolls which accompanied the detachments from said fort, and where thus charged against the respective soldiers but were not transferred to the company rolls nor retained out of the soldier's pay and allowed to said William Kendall, deceased, the said amounts, not to exceed, exclusive of interest, $2,000, shall be allowed and paid to the legal representative of said William Kendall, deceased, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill has received the approval of the appropriate officers of the Treasury Department. The Second Auditor has investigated the case, and in a letter written, I think, in 1886, says that this is plainly a just claim and an accounting ought to be had. It has been shown to the satisfaction of the committee and also the Second Auditor that charges entered on the muster and descriptive rolls accompanying certain detachments sent from Fort Columbus, New York Harbor, between January 1, 1867, and December 31, 1868, were not transferred to the rolls of the company to which the recruits were assigned, and for this reason William Kendall, who was sutler to the Army at Fort Columbus, never received pay for his services and sales.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the letter of the Second Auditor printed in the report?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House for favorable consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

W. M. JACOBS.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 10938) to reimburse certain persons the amount of expenses incurred and losses sustained by reason of the seizure of certain fraudulently stamped cigars sold them by W. M. Jacobs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to audit all claims for expenses and losses of all kinds incurred by any customers of W. M. Jacobs, doing business as W. M. Jacobs & Co., as the Eagle Cigar Company, and as the Postal Cigar Company, of Lancaster, Pa., in restamping, reclaiming, and reshipping of cigars bought of said W. M. Jacobs, which said cigars by reason of having been fraudulently stamped by said W. M. Jacobs at the time of their sale to said customers, were seized by the Government and held until restamped by said customers and until certain penalties had been paid thereon.

SEC. 2. That after said claims shall have been duly audited and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury he is hereby authorized to pay the amounts found due to each of said customers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The following committee amendments were read:

Amend the title so as to read:

"A bill for the relief of parties from whom cigars were seized on account of bearing counterfeit stamps."

Strike out all of section 1 after the word "authorized," in line 4, and insert the following: "and directed to pay innocent purchasers of cigars bearing counterfeit stamps, placed upon the market by W. M. Jacobs & Co., of the ninth collection district of Pennsylvania, the amounts found by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have been paid by such parties to obtain the release of such cigars as may have been seized on account of bearing said counterfeit stamps, either as offers of compromise or for genuine stamps purchased and affixed to such cigars in place of the counterfeit stamps."

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, Mr. OLMSTED, who is familiar with the facts in the case and, I may say, prepared the report at my request.

Mr. OLMSTED (Mr. LACEY temporarily in the chair). Mr. Chairman, for some years prior to April, 1899, M. W. Jacobs was doing business on a very large scale as a tobacco manufacturer at Lancaster, Pa., under the name of Jacobs & Company, the Eagle Cigar Company, the Postal Cigar Company, and other names. It subsequently transpired that he was also doing a very large business in the manufacture of counterfeit revenue stamps, making a counterfeit so perfect that even the officers of the Government for a long time were unable to distinguish it from the genuine. About that time, however, they became aware of his nefarious operations and also of the fact that he had confederates. Instead of stopping him at the time, they permitted him to go on manufacturing cigars and stamping them with what they knew, but nobody else knew, to be counterfeit stamps.

They permitted him to go on to the end that they might discover his confederates. They did so after some months and unearthed one of the most gigantic plans for the defrauding of the Government in that direction that has ever been known, resulting in sending to the penitentiary an ex-United States district attorney, and another lawyer who were, with others, confederated with Jacobs. The Government seized the property of Jacobs and sold it, realizing about $28,000. They also collected from debtors of Jacobs moneys due him from those debtors, so that the Government realized about $30,000 from his property and debts. In the meantime there were some innocent sellers of cigars who had purchased from Jacobs cigars with these counterfeit stamps upon them, not knowing them to be counterfeit.

The Government seized those cigars in the hands of these innocent traders and compelled them to compromise with the Government by paying for other stamps. Now, those gentlemen would have had recourse against Jacobs, who was solvent when they traded with him, but for the fact that the Government had seized the property and credits of Jacobs and sold them, realizing this $30,000 for itself. This bill is to reimburse those innocent holders who were found having cigars in their possession bearing these counterfeit stamps. It is approved by the collector of internal revenue and the bill as it now stands was drawn by the collector of internal revenue.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That form was adopted by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. OLMSTED. The form recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was adopted by the Committee on Claims, which has recommended amendments to the original bill to make it conform with the ideas of the Commissioner.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman know how much money is involved?

Mr. OLMSTED. There is only one of which I have personal knowledge, and that is for $745 and some odd cents, due to Mr. Livingstone, a very reputable gentleman living in my district; but I infer from my personal conference with the collector of internal revenue that there are perhaps five or six thousand dollars in all, possibly more.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. And the Government has received already $30,000.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman think that, even under that state of facts, it would be a good thing to put in here an amendment that the payment should not exceed $30,000? And if the gentleman would make it $10,000 it would suit me better.

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not think there will be claims found to exceed that. That knowledge is not in my possession, but the point is that these cigars bore counterfeit stamps and came into the possession of these innocent holders through the fact that the Government officers and agents thought it best in the interests of justice not to stop Jacobs from manufacturing the stamps until they had discovered those who were confederated with him.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know exactly how this bill reads, but I will venture an amendment providing that no claim shall be paid which is not presented within six months after the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That no claim shall be paid which is not presented within six months after the passage of this act.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will accept that amendment.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, we will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I am going to offer still another amendment:

Provided further, That not more than $30,000 shall be paid from the Treasury on account of such claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That not more than $30,000 shall be paid from the Treasury on account of such claims.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I have no knowledge of any claims amounting to any such sum as that; but the information upon the subject is not in my possession, and whatever the claims honestly amount to, as found by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided here, ought to be paid. If the amount should be found to be one dollar more than the gentleman's amendment provides for, I do not know how it would be divided.

Mr. PAYNE. Pro rata.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Suppose the amount should be limited to $30,000, and it should be discovered that the claims that could be sustained under this bill amount to $30,500. How are you going to apportion them?

Mr. PAYNE. I would add the words "to be paid pro rata."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Would that be fair, under the basis of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the strong argument that appealed to me was the fact that the Government had taken the property of this man Jacobs and sold it and received $30,000 for it, and if the Government had not seized his property these people could have sued him and got these claims. Now, having taken his property to the amount of $30,000, I am willing to reimburse these people to that extent, and if the claims do not amount to more than this sum you are perfectly safe.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. PAYNE, on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE), there were—ayes 33, noes 43.

Mr. OLMSTED. In order to conform to the bill as drawn by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and also to conform to the report of the committee, the second section of the bill ought to be stricken out. It does not appear to be so marked in the printed copy, and I move that the second section be stricken out.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not object to that, if my amendment is added to the first section. I am glad the gentleman accepted even that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to offer a few remarks upon the merits of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment is still pending. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened quite attentively to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] in the brief explanation he made of the character of this bill, and I am unable to understand the theory of liability, or the philosophy upon which he bases the liability of the Government.

I understand that the firm with which Mr. Jacobs was connected was engaged in the manufacture and sale of tobacco and cigars, and that they counterfeited a large number of stamps and sold cigars and tobaccos with the counterfeit stamps upon them, and revenue officers of the Government afterwards went around and seized cigars and tobaccos in the hands of innocent purchasers having the counterfeit stamps upon them, and the purchasers were compelled to pay the regular Government tax. That is the case in a nutshell.

Mr. OLMSTED. If the gentleman will permit me right there, I will venture the observation that that is not the case in a nutshell. These stamps were sold after the Government knew that Jacobs was counterfeiting them, with the knowledge of the Government, but not with the knowledge of the innocent purchasers. The Government thought it better, in the interest of the public service, to permit this to go on until its agents could unearth the whole plot.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is nothing in the bill limiting the claimants at all to such transactions as that. The bill does not limit the liability of the Government to sales of cigars and tobaccos containing the counterfeit Government stamps within the period or time after the Federal officers had knowledge of the counterfeit work. There is no such limitation contained in the bill; but respecting sales made prior to that time, sales made in the course of trade right along, wherever the Government discovered them and required the full payment of taxes, may be recovered under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CASSEL. If I may interrupt the gentleman, he is mistaken, as he will see if he will read the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just a moment. Upon the same principle, if a man in the ordinary course of business receives counterfeit money, he has the same right to go to the Government and ask it to reimburse him—to give him good, honest coin for the counterfeit money that comes to him in the course of trade. Now, the fact that the Government received $30,000 from these cigar makers and tobacco manufacturers does not alter the situation in any respect, because I understand that the Government holds a lien upon all the stock and assets of cigar and tobacco factories for the taxes.

Are we to establish the precedent now that the prior lien of the Government for the tobacco tax shall be waived in favor of men who have been defrauded by counterfeiters, by conspirators? This bill involves quite an important principle, it seems to me. I do not believe the Government ought to be held responsible for this claim at all. It was the misfortune of the innocent purchasers from this dishonest firm. The Government simply pursued the policy provided by public law. No statement has been made to the House showing that if the Government had taken action immediately upon its discovery of the counterfeiting that these men, the claimants, would have had any less tobacco or cigars on hand with spurious stamps on them than they did at the time the Government required them to pay the taxes.

There is nothing to shown and nobody has yet claimed, that these particular claimants suffered any on account of the delay of the Government. They were regularly in business and probably had as much stock on hand with spurious stamps at the time the fraud was first discovered as they did when their goods were seized. I believe the bill is wrong in principle and establishes a most dangerous precedent, and I shall vote against it. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

I. R. HARKRADER.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I now call up the bill H. R. 11205.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he intends to pass any of these bills in the House?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the gentleman knows it is now twenty-five minutes past 4?

Mr. GRAFF. There are three or four members here who are urging me to pass their bills; and though they involve small amounts, they are exceedingly important to them.

Mr. PAYNE. Undoubtedly that would be the case if the gentleman sat here for a week. It is twenty-five minutes after 4 o'clock, and very often for public business we are not allowed to sit later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. GRAFF. There seems to be deep interest in the business in which we are engaged.

Mr. PAYNE. You may be deeper interested after the committee rises.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11205) for the relief of I. R. Harkrader.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to I. R. Harkrader, sheriff of Wythe County, Va., the sum of $97, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the — day of August, 1896, to the time of making payment, for expenses incurred in producing before Charles H. Simonton, United States district judge, at Greenville, S. C., one H. G. Wadley, in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus issued by said court.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 6, up to and including the word "payment," in line 9; and recommend that the bill as so amended do pass.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. This bill is for $97 for the expenses of a sheriff incurred in obedience to an order made by Judge Simonton, of the Federal court. Judge Simonton directed the sheriff of Wythe County, Va., to carry a prisoner from that county to Greenville, S. C., and this bill is for that expense. Judge Simonton investigated the item and ordered that it be paid by the marshal of the district, but he had no money to pay it. All that is in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

TO REFUND PENALTY TO THE BANK OF COLFAX, IOWA.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 13257) introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13257) to refund penalty to the Bank of Colfax, Iowa.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to refund to the Bank of Colfax, Iowa, the sum of $75, penalty collected by reason of delay in the receipt of special tax.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will give some explanation of that bill.

Mr. LACEY (Mr. OLMSTED having resumed the chair). Mr. Chairman, in this case the wife of the cashier of the bank was taken suddenly ill, and the result was that he did not mail his bank tax until the last day, this unfortunate occurrence in the family having delayed him. In the excitement of the time he put a 2-cent stamp upon the envelope instead of a 4-cent stamp, and the collector refused to receive it. It was returned, and that threw the tax one day late, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is unable to refund this penalty and has recommended that it be paid. That is all there is to it.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES W. CARR.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I now ask to take up the bill (H. R. 14164) for the relief of Charles W. Carr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $83.71 be allowed to Charles W. Carr, former postmaster at Englewood, Ill. being the amount deposited by him to cover a deficiency arising in his office in the year 1894, which deposit was made to cover a loss caused by the payment by a clerk of two forged money orders, Nos. 1166 and 1540, on April 17 and May 6, 1894, respectively, without blame or fault on the part of said Charles W. Carr; and that a sum sufficient to pay the allowance now made is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The following committee amendments were read:

Strike out the word "forty" in line 10 and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty-three."

Insert the words "issued at Lansing, Mich.," after the word "forty-three" in line 10.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB B. PHILLIPS.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 3525) for the relief of Jacob B. Phillips.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,850 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of Jacob B. Phillips, managing owner of the schooner Nathan Lawrence, in full and final settlement for damages sustained by reason of a collision between the United States transport Minnewaska and said schooner on the morning of March 7, 1899.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all of said bill after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the claim of Jacob B. Phillips, managing owner of the schooner Nathan Lawrence, alleged to have been damaged by a collision with the United States transport Minnewasko, on March 7, 1899, be referred to the Court of Claims with jurisdiction and authority to hear and determine the same to judgment, with the right of appeal as in other cases: Provided, That no suit shall be brought under the provisions of this act after six months from the date of the passage thereof: And provided further, That no judgment shall be rendered against the Government unless it shall affirmatively appear from the evidence adduced that such collision was the result of negligence on the part of the United States or its agents."

Amend the title to read: "A bill to grant jurisdiction and authority to the Court of Claims to adjudidate the claim of Jacob B. Phillips against the United States."

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, my understanding was that the committee had amended the bill so as to restore it to its original condition. The facts in this case are these: The damage resulted from the collision between the U. S. transport Minnewaska on March 7, 1899, who fouled the schooner Nathan Lawrence, out of which this damage came, amounting to $2,850. The Quartermaster-General wrote a letter favoring the payment of this in the following language:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 24, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith H. R. 11604, for the relief of Jacob B. Phillips, appropriating the sum of $2,850 in payment to him for damages sustained by reason of a collision between the U. S. transport Minnewaska and the sailing schooner Nathan Lawrence on the morning of March 7, 1899, referred by the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, for facts and information; also an opinion touching the merits and justice of the claim.

In response thereto copies of the correspondence on file in this office are herewith inclosed, which afford all the facts and information of record in the Department bearing on the case.

From this correspondence it is shown that on the morning of March 7, 1899, during a severe storm, the army transport Thomas, formerly Minnewaska, while lying at anchor off Newport News, dragged her anchor and fouled with the schooner Nathan Lawrence.

Upon receipt in this office of the report of the accident the quartermaster at Fort Monroe was directed to investigate and report the facts and circumstances under which the damages to the schooner accrued, the estimated cost for repairs, and the amount claimed by the master of the schooner.

His report, dated March 17, 1899, copy herewith, states that the total loss due to the accident, including repairs, salary of the master, crew, wharfage, and demurrage, is $2,850, and with his report incloses statements of the master of the ship and two shipwrights as to the damage sustained by the schooner.

The army transport Thomas was at the time of the accident without any cargo on board, and was therefore light in the water, and the storm coming on suddenly it was not possible to avoid the accident, though every precaution was taken by the master and crew to prevent it.

In reply to a letter of Messrs. Bickford & Stuart, attorneys, advising this office that they represented the owners of the schooner Nathan Lawrence in their claim for damage, they were advised that there are no funds of the Quartermaster's Department applicable to payment of claims for damages and that Congress alone can grant relief in such cases.

The bill H. R. 11604 provides for payment of the amount reported to this office as damage to the schooner Nathan Lawrence and expenses incident thereto. If Congress decides to authorize payment of the sum named, the Quartermaster-General has no objection to offer to the passage of the bill.

Very respectfully,

M. I. LUDINGTON,
Quartermaster-General U. S. Army.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that all after the first line be omitted and that the bill read as it read in the first ten lines of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the committee reconsidered their action in referring it to the Court of Claims because the amount was absolutely fixed and inquired into by the War Department, and there seems to be no reason why it should be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the committee have in mind any doubt about the negligence on the part of the vessel belonging to the United States?

Mr. GRAFF. We acted first on the theory of referring it to Court of Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I renew the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment is now pending.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw it.

Mr. GRAFF. The committee, Mr. Chairman, authorizes me to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I offer the amendment myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the committee amendment.

The amendment was considered; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. LOVERING), there were—ayes 37, noes 48.

Mr. PAYNE. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The question on ordering tellers was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Seven gentlemen rising; not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The noes have it, and the amendment is lost.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have the report read on this bill. We are voting out $2,850, when the Department has said all they know about it is what is contained in the correspondence. It seems that one ship in a storm slid over against another ship. I ask that the report may be read. The gentleman from New York offered an amendment referring it to the Court of Claims, which has been voted down. We are going to pay $2,850 when there is no established liability anywhere, and it is not believed that there is any liability whatever. The committee have changed their opinion upon it since they made this report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee is now voting upon amendments and the debate is under the five-minute rule. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized and is entitled to have the report read to the extent of his time of five minutes.

Mr. BURKETT. Then let the Clerk read the letter from the War Department.

The Clerk read the letter from the War Department printed above in the remarks of Mr. LOVERING.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, from that report there is no liability on the part of the Government either in law, in justice, or in equity. The statute provides touching damages by vessels of the United States for the appointment of a board. Where the board makes the investigation and makes a report showing the negligence on the part of the servants of the United States and consequent damage, it has been quite usual to pay the amount. But this negatives any idea of negligence. It states that in the harbor, where the transports have a right to be, a sudden storm came up and, although the master and crew exercised the highest kind of diligence, she dragged her anchor and there was a collision. Why, that does not make the Government liable. It would not make a citizen liable.

Now, I have no objection to this case going to the Court of Claims, but I do object to making this a precedent, because in every conceivable injury where the highest kind of diligence was exercised upon the part of the Government we would be liable, if this precedent is to be followed. It seems to me that the best course is either to send this matter to the Court of Claims or defeat the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 30, noes 34.

So the question was determined in the negative.

Mr. GRAFF. Was the question just taken on laying the bill aside to be favorably reported?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. GRAFF. I went over to see the gentleman from Massachusetts to ascertain from him whether he would not accept the amendment which was insisted upon by a number of gentlemen here. I think he is willing now to accept it, if the Committee of the Whole is willing to report the bill with the amendment. I understood that was the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and also of my colleague [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to sending this claim to the Court of Claims, although on the facts as stated by the Quartermaster-General the highest degree of diligence was exercised by the master and crew of this vessel.

Mr. GRAFF. If that is true——

Mr. CANNON. It is so stated in the report.

Mr. GRAFF. Then is my colleague willing to have the bill reported to the House with the amendment of the committee referring the case to the Court of Claims?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GRAFF. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the bill be laid aside with the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SIMS. I object.

KATIE A. NOLAN.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I call up the bill (H. R. 1749) for the relief of Katie A. Nolan.

Mr. PAYNE. While the Clerk is looking for this bill, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] when he is going to move that the committee rise.

Mr. GRAFF. I intended to make that motion at this time. As a matter of fact, the only bill for any constituent of mine has not yet been reached. I expected to reach it on the next call, if permitted to do so.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I withdraw my question.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay unto Katie A. Nolan, of San Antonio, Tex., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $800, in full of the difference of pay due to her as stamp clerk at the post-office at San Antonio, Tex., between the salary actually received by her and the amount of salary to which she was entitled by law from July 1, 1889, to July 1, 1893.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to pay a difference of salary in the case of a stamp clerk from 1889 to 1893. The law provided that the minimum salary of the stamp clerk should be $800. This lady had been paid only $600, as the office when she entered it was paying only that amount. In the meantime the law was amended and the minimum was fixed at $800. The Department writes to the committee that this lady is entitled to the difference between $600 and $800 per annum from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1893. For 1894 the Department corrected the error and allowed her the $200 additional. For the four years preceding she is entitled to the difference between $800 and $600.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to hear the report in this case so that we may know what the Department says. I ask that the report be read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1749) for the relief of Katie A. Nolan, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass without amendment:

This is a bill enacting that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay to Katie A. Nolan, of San Antonio, Tex., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $800, in full of the difference of pay due to her as stamp clerk at the post-office at San Antonio, Tex., between the salary received by her and the amount of salary to which she was entitled by law from July 1, 1889, to July 1, 1893.

The First Assistant Postmaster-General informs the committee that the records of his office show that Miss Nolan was carried on the rolls of the San Antonio, Tex., post-office from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1894, as a stamp clerk at a salary of $600 per annum.

The minimum salary for a stamp clerk fixed by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, is $800 per annum. It would therefore appear that Miss Nolan was entitled to the difference between $600, the amount allowed her, and $800, the minimum salary allowed under the law—viz, $200 a year—for five years, from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1894, or a total of $1,000.

The error in fixing Miss Nolan's salary at $600, however, was discovered in this office in time to allow her the additional $200 for the year ending June 30, 1894. It therefore appears that Miss Nolan is justly entitled to the increased salary for four years—July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1893—viz, $800.

Mr. LOUD. I understand that there is appended to the report a letter of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. If so, I ask that it be read. I suppose it is unseemly to question what the Department has said in relation to a case of this kind; but I can not imagine any justification for such a bill as this.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can explain it.

Mr. LOUD. There is no such thing as an explanation under the law and under the policy of the Department. Let the letter of the First Assistant Postmaster-General be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, June 5, 1900.

SIR: Referring to your communication of the 29th ultimo, inclosing copy of H. R. No. 11616, entitled "A bill for the relief of Katie A. Nolan," I beg to inform you that the records of this office show that Miss Nolan was carried on the rolls of the San Antonio, Tex., post-office from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1894, as a stamp clerk at a salary of $600 per annum. The minimum salary for a stamp clerk, fixed by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, is $800 per annum. It would therefore appear that Miss Nolan was entitled to the difference between $600, the amount allowed her, and $800, the minimum salary allowed under the law—viz, $200 a year for five years from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1894, or a total of $1,000.

The error in fixing Miss Nolan's salary at $600, however, was discovered in this office in time to allow her the additional $200 for the year ended June 30, 1894. It therefore appears that Miss Nolan is justly entitled to the increased salary for four years, July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1893, viz, $800.

Very respectfully,

PERRY S. HEATH,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

HON. JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, April 30, 1900.

SIR: Referring to the matter of the balance due Miss Kate A. Nolan as stamp clerk in your office from July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1894, you are advised that an examination of the records of this office show that Miss Nolan was allowed a salary of $600 per annum during the period in question, while under the law as a stamp clerk she was entitled to a minimum salary of $800.

This office, while willing to allow Miss Nolan the difference between the salary which she received and that to which she was entitled, is unable to allow the entire amount as the appropriation for the first four years, viz, 1889-90, 1890-91, 1891-92, and 1892-93, has lapsed, and any unexpended portion thereof has been covered into the Treasury.

This office is, however, able to allow her the balance due for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894, viz, $200, and you are authorized to pay the same to her, taking separate vouchers for each ($50 each) quarter, and claim credit for the amount thus paid in your return to the Auditor for the present quarter.

Very respectfully,

PERRY S. HEATH,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

POSTMASTER, San Antonio, Tex.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I am not inclined to question what the First Assistant Postmaster-General has said in the letter just read. I will only say that the precedent to be established by the passage of this bill will, if carried out, involve the expenditure of many millions of dollars for the payment of similar claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported with a favorable recommendation?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

CHARLES A. CUTLER.

Mr. GRAFF. I call up the bill (H. R. 10921) for the relief of Charles A. Cutler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles A. Cutler an amount equal to the pay of a second lieutenant from the 18th of February, 1865, to the 13th day of February, 1866, less the amount paid him as an enlisted man.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "pay," in line 4, insert the words "out of any funds of the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES R. HOOPER.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 2639) for the relief of Charles R. Hooper.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas in the year 1894 Charles R. Hooper was employed by the United States Government in the capacity of first-class blacksmith in the forge shop in the navy-yard in the city of Washington, D. C.; and

Whereas while so engaged in said forge shop he was by an accident struck in the left eye with a piece of steel, which resulted in the entire loss of said eye. The United States naval surgeon, Dr. Wise, medical officer then in charge of said navy-yard, rendered immediate service to said Charles R. Hooper, and said Dr. Wise did thereupon advise that the injured eye be removed, which was done on August 10, 1891, by Dr. William Marmion; and

Whereas by reason of the loss of said eye the said Charles R. Hooper is so completely incapacitated from continuing his labors in said forge that he is obliged to resort to such other menial labor as he can get and do at greatly reduced wages;

Wherefore he asks the Congress of the United States, as he received this injury while working in the line of duty, to pass the following bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed and required to pay to the said Charles R. Hooper, or to his heirs, the sum of $5,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That this act take effect from and after its approval by the President.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the claimant in this case, Mr. Hooper, was a skilled mechanic in the employ of the Government in the navy-yard from 1890 to 1895. During that time, and while in the performance of his duty, through the carelessness of a coworker, he was struck in the eye by a piece of steel and lost the sight of that eye. The testimony in this case shows that not only is he blind in the one eye, but on account of the sympathy of the other he is almost blind in that. The physicians, medical experts, testify that he will soon lose the sight of the other eye and become totally blind. He is a young man 27 years of age, with a wife and several children. The only means of support he has is working at his trade. He was compelled to resign by reason of this accident, and to-day is not able to engage in work of any kind.

My judgment, from what I have seen of the claimant and from the testimony of these physicians, is that within a very short time he will be totally blind and must spend the rest of his life in darkness. There are many precedents in this House for the passage of this bill. Here is a question simply of whether or not the Government shall take care of a man who was faithful in the discharge of his duty and injured while in the discharge of that duty without any fault on his part, or whether this burden shall be placed upon some public or private charity so that this man and his family may be cared for. We have recently passed a bill here to pay a large sum of money to an employee of the Government who fell down an elevator shaft.

We have also passed at this session of Congress, I think, a bill providing for the payment to another who fell down an elevator shaft in the Capitol building itself, and we have recommended two bills to-day similar in character to this one. I suggest to the members of this committee that I believe a no more meritorious measure has been presented during the sitting of the committee, and I trust it will meet with approval.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. As I understand, this case has never been before any court.

Mr. MILLER. This case has never been before any court.

Mr. COWHERD. Does the gentleman think it is wise in actions of tort such as this for a committee to pass upon the question of negligence and the question of the amount of damages, and everything of that sort, without submitting it to a court?

Mr. MILLER. We are not applying the rules of negligence in this case, Mr. Chairman. This committee has carefully considered this bill, and believes it is an equitable measure and ought to pass.

Mr. COWHERD. Does not the gentleman think it would be better if we submitted these cases to a court with the power of a court to pass upon those questions and find whether there was negligence?

Mr. MILLER. That might be a good plan if that had been the invariable rule of the committee or of the House, but I suggest this bill ought to stand on its merits and receive the same favorable consideration that other bills similar in character have received.

Mr. COWHERD. Well, the trouble is that the House does not get a chance to find out what the merits are.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is bad for a man to lose the sight of his eyes. It is bad for him to become blind. There is no doubt about that. Everybody has sympathy for a man who has that kind of misfortune, no matter whether the man is in the employ of the Government or out of its employ. But as I understand it, the Government of the United States has always declined to pension its civil employees, and where one in the military or naval service of the Government is pensioned we have always maintained that in order to receive the pension he must have been injured in the line of his duty in that military or naval service. Gentlemen all understand that.

Now, what is this case? As stated by the gentleman in charge of the bill, a man in the employ of the Government, working at the anvil, receives an injury to the eye from a piece of steel knocked off by a hammer in the hands of a coemployee. There is no proof of negligence. On the contrary, it is put upon the ground that negligence cuts no figure in this case. So says the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEEKS] in my hearing, and so did my friend the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield, as I said, the testimony before this committee shows conclusively that there was negligence of the coemployee. In place of striking a fair blow with the hammer he struck a side blow with the hammer, and it was by this side blow of the hammer that a piece of steel was caused to fly off and fly into the eye of the faithful and efficient workman, who was doing his part and doing it well.

Mr. CANNON. Let us see. Here is the statement:

> And while working in the line of his duty his left eye was destroyed by the stroke of a small piece of steel, cast off from the hammer of a fellow-workman by reason of a side blow struck upon an iron band that they were engaged in placing upon a wooden body. There was some showing before the committee to the effect that the stroke was negligent.

Now, there was "some showing." Was there a cross-examination of the witness? Was there any inquiry made——

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield——

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to say that the affidavits of a number of persons in the employ of the Government, who were familiar with the accident and how it occurred, were filed with our committee, and the gentleman will find in some of those affidavits accompanying this report the statement that there was negligence. The affidavit of John H. Swain himself, who was the one who struck the blow, contains the following statement:

> I was Mr. Hooper's helper for about two years, from 1893 to 1894. On the 1st day of August, 1894, about 1.36 p. m., Mr. Hooper was putting an iron band on a wooden body. I was striking for Mr. Hooper with a sledge hammer on the tool with which he was holding on the band, when my sledge hammer fell sideways, striking the tool and cutting a piece of steel out of it, which flew into Mr. Hooper's left eye. Mr. Hooper dropped everything, walked over to his anvil, and said his eye was gone. I saw the blood drop on the anvil.

Mr. CANNON. It fell sidewise. Was that negligence? My friend says he thinks it was. This man who made the statement does not so claim.

Now, I am perfectly willing that this bill should pass with a limitation of recovery of $5,000 if the gentleman will amend it so as to send it to the Court of Claims and let the Court of Claims render a judgment for not exceeding $5,000, provided that negligence on the part of a coemployee appears. That is going a great way; yes. My friend here says a corporation would not be liable, or an employer would not be liable under the same circumstances. That is true, but if there was no negligence certainly there can be no shade of equity in the premises. I will ask my friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] if he does not feel at liberty to offer an amendment sending the case to the Court of Claims?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WEEKS. I did make the statement quoted by the gentleman from Illinois, that the question of negligence was not or ought not to be considered or involved in this case. I think it is not. I purposely made that statement in the hearing of the gentleman because I thought the House of Representatives, representing the people of this great nation, could not afford to apply the technical rules of evidence and of law as we find it administered in the courts, touching the question of negligence of coemployees or contributory negligence.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the case which we passed a few moments ago (the Goldsborough case), where a military surgeon contracted blood poisoning from an operation upon a negro sailor. Was there any negligence in that case on the part of the Government? And yet this House voted unanimously to pay the widow $5,000, where there was no possible pretense of negligence on the part of the Government or anyone else. At the last session of Congress we voted to pay $5,000, more or less, for an injury to a man injured in an elevator in the Treasury building, an employee of the Government, where there could be no pretense of negligence on the part of the Government or of a coemployee of the Government. And in the Ford's Theater case that we voted upon a few moments ago, granting $5,000 to the widow of a man who was injured in the collapse of that building, who died five years afterwards of heart disease, the same remark applies. Nobody raised the question.

I am interested in this case because I like to see this Government generous in a matter of this kind, not technical, not small and close, not applying the rigid rules of evidence and of law where an accident occurs to a person who in the Government employ receives an injury without fault of his own and without fault on the part of the Government, so long as it is shown that he has received substantial injury and is in need of the assistance of the Government on that account. This is not the grant of a civil pension, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] likens it. It is not the payment of a strictly legal claim, which must be proven by the strict rules of evidence and according to the technical rules of law, but rather it is a generous gratuity on the part of the Government to compensate its employee for injuries which are the result of an inexplicable and absolutely unavoidable accident without fault on either side.

There is a case now pending on to-day's Calendar of a young woman working in one of the armories where the Government was manufacturing gun cartridges. She suffered the loss of her eye and the loss of her hand by the explosion of a cartridge in her hand, a thing, as I am told, never heard of before or since. Are you going to apply the strict rule of evidence, that she must have proof of negligence of the Government, in that case? There is another case of a man who lost his leg. That case was expected to be put before the House this afternoon. It is on to-day's Calendar. The man suffered amputation of his leg. It was the result of an accident without fault on either side.

The injury was no fault of his own, and no negligence was attributable to coemployees. It was one of those unexplainable accidents which occur, just like the explosion which occurred a few days ago in the turret of the Massachusetts. Suppose a claim is presented here against the Government for injuries received there. I say that in such cases we ought not to apply the strict rules of evidence or of law which would be expected in a court in a suit brought by an employee to recover from a corporation or individual, where all the technicalities of law and fact are invoked by the defense.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman, because I have time, does he claim, even in the military service, in the performance of ordinary duty, if a man is injured, he should have $5,000, in war or peace?

Mr. WEEKS. That is a different case entirely.

Mr. GRAFF. Has the gentleman prepared his amendment?

Mr. CANNON. No; I have not. My friend is more expert than I am in a matter of that kind. Now, if every time we are sorry for some one who is hurt in the employ of the United States and take $5,000 out of the Treasury, why then let us make it go all around, and with much greater plausibility should it be given to the man who is not employed by the Government than the man who is, because the man who is not employed by the Government and has an accident works at a less wage, and in addition has to contribute by taxation to the man who is employed by the Government. Now, if we are going to try to be merciful and treat everybody, why let us treat all alike. The Ford's Theater case, that the gentleman refers to, was a case of well-defined negligence, showed beyond question, and to that degree that Congress thought proper to make compensation. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that there is a good reason why I do not accept the suggestion that this case go to the Court of Claims. This claimant is poor—in absolute poverty—without any means with which to employ counsel to take his case to the Court of Claims and prosecute it there; and we might as well defeat the bill in the House to-day as order him to take his claim to the Court of Claims. For that reason I have not felt at liberty to offer an amendment to that effect. I want to say further that nearly all the railroad companies in the country take care of their employees except in cases where the injury is received on account of the negligence of the employees. If the railroad companies do this for their employees, why ought not the Government of the United States as willingly care for its employees? I simply ask a vote upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 24.

So the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ROBERT BRIGHAM.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 1517) for the relief of Robert Brigham. After the consideration of this bill I shall move that the committee rise.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1517) for the relief of Robert Brigham.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Robert Brigham, late postmaster at Franklin, Pa., the sum of $2,666.93, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same being amount lost through the failure of Venango National Bank, where such money was deposited by order of the Postmaster-General.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out the following words: "two thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and ninety-three" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two thousand two hundred and sixty-six dollars and eighty-nine."

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY].

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will take but a moment in the explanation of this bill. It is a bill which has been before Congress for many years, and has been reported favorably by the committees of the House and the Senate in many Congresses. It has always been unanimously reported. Mr. Brigham, who is upward of 80 years of age, when he assumed the duties of postmaster at Franklin, Pa., was a man of independent fortune, as fortunes were then counted. When he left that position he was bankrupt. From being a small office it grew to be the third largest office in the State of Pennsylvania. He fitted the post-office up at his own expense. When the fire that swept through Oil Town destroyed that office it destroyed the fittings for which he had paid and for which he had received no recompense.

Hon. C. V. Culver, of the firm of Culver, Penn & Co., was then a member of the House of Representatives. Mr. Brigham was keeping his account with a banker, father-in-law of Major McDowell, Clerk of the House of Representatives. Mr. McDowell was a clerk for Mr. Brigham. Mr. Culver went to the Postmaster-General and asked that Brigham be instructed to keep his account with Culver, Penn & Co., and that order was made by the Postmaster-General. Mr. McDowell has seen the original order, being then a clerk in the office.

The account was transferred from Mr. Brigham's banker, who was also the bondsman of Culver, Penn & Co. That bank a few days afterwards failed, and Mr. Brigham was compelled to make good in the sum of $2,666. He was in no way negligent by any act of his own. It seems to me that the equities, as well as the law, are so strong in this case that there should be no further delay. If any gentleman will read the report I do not think he will object to the passage of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I see in the gentleman's statement he says that the loss was $2,666. The bill seems to be for a less amount.

Mr. SIBLEY. There was a dividend afterwards from Culver, Penn & Co. of 15 per cent, reducing the total by that amount.

The committee amendment was considered and agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration bills upon the Private Calendar and instructed him to report certain Senate bills without amendments, a Senate bill with amendment; also, certain House bills with amendments and certain others without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills do pass, as follows:

S. 3421. An act for the relief of Eleonora G. Goldsborough.

Mr. OLMSTED also reported that the committee had instructed him to report the House bill 2413 with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the various bills which have been reported to the House with the amendments to their passage.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the previous question be ordered on the bills and amendments to their passage, and the gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from New York single out the bill that he objects to and let the previous question be ordered upon the others.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes; I suggest that the gentleman from New York select such bills as he objects to.

Mr. PAYNE. I think we had better take them in their order.

Mr. GRAFF. I will ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it would be proper for me to make a motion to that effect. I move that the previous question be ordered on all the bills that have been reported and the amendments thereto to their passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order. Without objection, the bill (H. R. 3413) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SCARBOROUGH, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GRAFF. I hope that motion will be voted down.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—34 ayes and 61 noes.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I move that we take a recess until half past 10 to-morrow morning, for the purpose of considering the bills which have been reported from the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the latter part of the motion is concerned, it is not in order.

Mr. GRAFF. Then I will modify it by moving that we take a recess until 10.30 to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House take a recess until half past 10 to-morrow morning.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PAYNE) there were—74 ayes and 5 noes.

Mr. PAYNE. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having counted the House). One hundred members are present—less than a quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask for the application of the rule which requires a call of the yeas and nays under the present circumstances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; and the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in absent members. The roll will now be called. As many as are in favor of taking a recess will, as their names are called, answer "aye;" contrary opinion, "no." Members so desiring will be recorded as "present."

The question was taken; and there were on the roll, as finally made up—yeas 152, nays 9, answered "present" 20, not voting 172; as follows:
